

John Adams Library.

IN THE CUSTODY OF THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY.

SHELF N^o

X ADAMS

172.15

20.8

T H E
H I S T O R Y
O F
I T A L Y,

Translated from the ITALIAN of FRANCESCO GUICCIARDINI,

B Y
AUSTIN PARKE GODDARD, Esq;
The T H I R D E D I T I O N.

V O L. VIII.

L O N D O N,
Printed for Z. STUART, at the Lamb, in Pater-noster-Row.
MDCCLXIII.

✓ 172.15

W. 8

172.15

172.15

172.15

Francesco Guicciardini's
H I S T O R Y
O F

The W A R S in I T A L Y.

B O O K XV.

ending p. 709.

T H E C O N T E N T S.

Pope Adrian arrives at Rome. Enters into a Confederacy with the Emperor and Venetians against France. Island of Rhodes taken by Solyman Sultan of the Turks. Death of Pope Adrian, and Election of Clement VII. Duke of Bourbon deserts from the King of France, and enters into the Service of the Emperor. King of France sends an Army into Italy, and makes a League with Pope Clement. Imperialists invade France, over-run Provence, and besiege Marfeilles, but are forced to abandon that Enterprife, and retreat. King of France follows them into Italy, takes the City of Milan, and besieges Pavia. Emperor's Army advances to relieve the Place, a Battle ensues, in which the French are defeated, many of the Nobles killed, and the King himself taken Prisoner.

THE HISTORY OF

A. D.
1522.

Italy under Fear of a new French Invasion.

HOUGH the late Victory over the French had composed the Affairs of Lombardy, it had not however lessened the Jealousy that the King of France, having his Kingdom entire, and at Peace, and the Generals and Men at Arms that he had sent into Italy returned in Safety, would, before it was long, make a fresh Attack on the Dutchy of Milan, especially considering that the Swiss were as ready as before to enter into his Pay, and the Venetian Senate persevered in their antient Confederacy with him. The Consideration of this Danger engaged the Cæsarean Generals to maintain and keep in Pay the Army, which was very difficult for them to do, because cause they received no Money from Cæ- A. D. far nor from the Kingdom of Naples, 1522. and the State of Milan was so far exhausted as to be insufficient of itself alone to quarter such Numbers of Soldiers, and support such great Expences.

THE WARS IN ITALY.

5

 Wherefore, without paying any Regard to the Cries of the People, or the Remonstrances of the College of Cardinals, they had sent the greater Part of the Troops to take up their Quarters in the ecclesiastic State: And Don Carlo di Lanoja, newly appointed Viceroy of Naples in room of Raimondo di Cardona deceased, in his Passage through Rome, settled, in a Conference with Don Giovanni Ma- nuel, the Contributions, determining that for the Three next Months the State of Milan should pay every Month Twenty Thousand Ducats, the Floren- tines Fifteen Thousand, the Genoese Eight Thousand, Siena Five Thousand, and Lucca Four Thousand. Though every Body exclaimed against this Tax, yet such was their Dread of the victorious Army that they were under a Necessity of submitting to it. The Im-

A. D. 1522. posers assuring them that it was indispensably necessary, because on the Preservation of those Forces depended the Defence of Italy; and, at the End of the Term the Imposition was renewed, but in much easier Sums.

IN this melancholy Situation of Affairs in Italy oppressed with a Train of Evils, and under Apprehensions of greater to come, the Arrival of the Pope was impatiently expected as a seasonable Help, by Means of the pontifical Authority, for composing a Multitude of Differences and providing against manifold Disorders: The Pontiff was earnestly intreated by Cæsar, who was at that Time on his Voyage by Sea to Spain, and had by the Way a Conference with the King of England, to wait for him at Barcelona, whither he would come in Person and acknowledge and adore him for Pope. But he refused to wait his Coming, either on account of the Distance of Cæsar, who was as yet in the farthest Parts of Spain, which would not suffer him to lose so

so much Time as to force him afterwards to sail in an unfavourable Season, or from a Suspicion that Cæsar sought to make him defer his Passage to Italy; or, as many would have it, because he would not give too much Ground for the Opinion which had been entertained of him from the Beginning, that he could not help being too much devoted to Cæsar, which would obstruct the Negotiation of an universal Peace among Christians, which he had resolved to take upon him. He passed then by Sea to Rome, where he made his Entry on the Twenty Ninth of August, amidst a vast Concourse of People, by whom tho' his Coming was desired with the utmost Impatience, because Rome, without the Presence of Pontiffs, is more like a Desert than a City, yet the Sight created a Sort of Uneasiness in the Minds of all who considered that they had got a Pope of a barbarous Nation, quite unexperienced in the Affairs of Italy, of the Court, and even of those Nations which by long Intercourse were grown familiar

A. D.

1522.

Pope
Adrian enters Rome.

A. D. to Italy. The Sadness of these Reflex-1522. ions was heightened by a Plague, which breaking out at Rome at his Arrival, was interpreted as a very bad Omen of his Pontificate, and made great Devastation during the whole Autumn.

THE first Resolution of this Pope was to use his Endeavours for the Recovery of Rimini, and to accommodate the Differences which had subsisted between the Duke of Ferrara and his two last Predecessors. For these Purposes he ordered into Romagna Fifteen Hundred Spanish Foot which he had brought with him as a Convoy to secure his Passage by Sea.
 While he was intent on these Things, it appearing to Cæsar that it was of great Importance for the Settlement of the Affairs of Italy to detach the Venetians from the King of France, in Hopes that the Senate, from the Diminution of the French Power and Interest, were disposed to embrace a Peace, and not for the Interests of others to run the Hazard of transferring the War into their own Dominions; he communicated his Purpose to the King of England, who had before privately lent him Money to help him against the King of France, but afterwards laid aside his Diffimulation, and now openly espoused the Cause: They both sent Ambassadors to Venice to solicit the Senate to enter into a Confederacy with Cæsar for the Defence of Italy. The Ambassador for Cæsar was Girolamo Adorno, and for the King of England Richard Pacey, and there was an Ambassador expected from Ferdinand, Brother to Cæsar and Archduke of Austria, whose Interest was necessary, whatever Peace should be made, on account of the many Differences between him and the Venetians. The King of England sent also an Herald to denounce War to the King of France, if he would not make a general Truce with Cæsar for Three Years in all Parts of the World, in which should be included the Church, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines, complaining also that he had ceased to pay him the Fifty Thousand Ducats which he was obliged to pay every Year. The King refused to consent to a Truce, and roundly answered that it was not proper to pay Money to one who as-1522.
 of

A. D.

Cæsar and the King of England solicit the Venetians against the French.

fisted

A. D. 1522.  fisted his Enemies with Money: By this Means the Animofities between them being exasperated, the Ambaffadors at each Court were difmiffed.

THIS Year Don Giovanni Manuel, who had been Cæſar's Plenipotentiary at Rome, departed out of Italy. At his departure he delivered to the Florentines a Schedule of his own Hand-writing, in which it was related how Cæſar by a Schedule written in September 1520 promiſed Pope Leo to confirm and grand anew to the Florentines the Privileges of the State, the Authority, and the Lands which they poſſeſſed, within Six Months after the firſt Diet held ſince the Coronation which was celebrated at Aix la Chapelle; for he had firſt promiſed them to make this Conceſſion within Four Months from his Election, but ſaid he had not been able, for juſt Reaſons, to expedite it to them at that Time; but Don Giovanni in the Name of Cæſar promiſed to make good the Contents of the Schedule, which was ratified by Cæſar in March 1523, and expedited by a Deed in a very ample Manner.

THIS

THE WARS IN ITALY.

II

A. D.

1522.

THIS Year Cæsar, as was said before, passed into Spain, where, on his Arrival, he proceeded with Severity against many who had been Authors of the Sedition, and discharged all the rest without inflicting any Punishment : And to accompany his Justice and Clemency with Examples of Rewards, on taking into Consideration that Ferdinando Duke of Calabria, refused to be Leader of the seditious Multitude, and chose rather not to leave his Confinement in the Castle of Sciativæ, he sent for him with great Honour to his Court, and not long after gave him in Marriage Germana, Widow of the late Catholic King, and rich, but barren, with a View that in him, who was the last Descendant from old Alfonso, King of Aragon, that Family might become extinct, for his two younger Brothers were both dead before, one in France, and the other in Italy.

BUT what rendered this an unfortunate Year, with very great Reproaches Island of Rhodes conquered by Soly-

man the Turk.

A. D. to the Christian Princes was that, to-^{1522.} wards the End of it Solyman the Otto- man took the Island of Rhodes, under the Government of the Knights of Rhodes, before called Knights of Jeru- salem, who taking up their Residence in that Island, after they had been chased from Jerusalem, had for a very long Time, with vast Honour to their Order, preserved it tho' situated in the Midst between the Turk and the Soldan, Princes of such mighty Power, and made it considered as the Bulwark of Christendom in those Seas, tho' the Knights had it laid to their Charge that, amidst their daily Cruises on the Ships of the Infidels, they sometimes took the Liberty to make Prizes of Vessels belonging to Christians. This Island was, for many Months, besieged by a very powerful Army, with the great Turk in Person, who lost not the least Time for harrassing the Defendants, sometimes by very furious Assaults, sometimes by working of Mines and Trenches, and sometimes by raising very large Cavaliers

THE WARS IN ITALY,

13 liers of Earth and Timber, which overtopped the Walls of the Town, by which Works tho' carried on with great Slaughter of his Men, the Number of the Garrison was considerably diminished; so that at length being spent with the continual Fatigues, and their Powder falling short, they were no longer in a Condition to resist such a Multitude of Distresses and Inconveniencies, the Mines having penetrated into many Places of the Town, in which the Besieged, being forced to abandon one after another the advanced Posts, were more and more straitened, till at length reduced to the utmost Necessity they capitulated with the Turk, and it was agreed that the Grand Master should surrender to him the Town, with Liberty for himself and all the Knights and Rhodians to depart thence in Safety, and to take with them as many of their Effects as they could carry, and for their Security in so doing the Turkish Fleet was to have Orders to quit those Seas, and the Army to draw off to the Distance

A. D.
 1522.

A. D. Distance of Five Miles from the Town 1522. of Rhodes. By Virtue of this Capitulation, which was faithfully observed, the Turks took Possession of Rhodes, and the Christians passed over to Sicily, and afterwards into Italy, having found in Sicily a Fleet of Ships fitted out tho' but slowly, thro' the Fault of the Pontiff, for throwing into Rhodes, as soon as the Wind should serve, a Supply of Provisions and warlike Stores. After the City was evacuated Solyman, for the greater Disparagement of the Christian Religion, made his Entry into the Place on the Day of the Nativity of the SON of GOD, and on that Day, solemnised with an Infinity of Hymns and Music in Christian Churches, he caused all the Churches in Rhodes that were dedicated to the Worship of CHRIST to be converted into Mosques, which according to the Custom of the Turks, the Christian Rites being totally abolished, were dedicated to the Worship of Makomet. Thus ended the Year 1522, with so much Ignominy to the Christian Name, and such

such were the Fruits of the Disorders of A. D. our Princes, tolerable however if the ^{1522.} Example of past Losses had given Instructions for the Time to come, but the Continuation of the Divisions among the Princes occasioned as great Calamities in 1523.

IN the Beginning of this Year the ^{1523.} Malatesti knowing themselves too weak to resist the Forces of the Pope, by the Interposition of the Duke of Urbino, were content to yield up Rimini and its Castle, with a View, tho' uncertain, of obtaining a Maintenance for Pandolfo during his Life, which did not take Effect.
 The Duke of Urbino afterwards waited on the Pontiff, and the glorious Memory of Pope Julius pleading in his Favour with his Holiness, and with the greater Part of the Court, he obtained Absolution from Censures, and to be re-invested with the Dutchy of Urbino, but with the Clause, without Prejudice to Rights, with a View of not prejudicing the Assignment which had been made of Mon- teseltro

Pope receives into Favour
 the Duke of Urbino.

A. D. teseltro to the Florentines, who affirmed 1523. that they had lent Pope Leo for the Defence of that Dutchy Three Hundred and Fifty Thousand Ducats, and that they had expended about Sixty Thousand Ducats more since his Death, in several Places for the Preservation of the State of the Church.

And the Duke of Ferrara.

THE Pope also received into Favour the Duke of Ferrara, reinvesting him not only with Ferrara, and all the Lands which, before the War made by Leo against the French, he possessed belonging to the Church, but, highly to his Disgrace, or that of his Ministers, who imposed upon his Ignorance in those Affairs, left him also in Possession of the Castles of San Felice and Finale, which being acquired by him when he entered into a War with Leo, and afterwards lost before his Death, he had taken the Opportunity of the Vacancy of the Sec to possess himself of anew. The Duke of Ferrara obliged himself to assist the Church with a certain Number of Troops,

Troops when they should be wanted for the Defence of its State ; and bound himself under most grievous Penalties, subjecting himself also to the Disannulling of his Investiture, and the Forfeiture of all his Rights in case he should for the future offend any more the Apostolic See. The Pope gave him good Hopes of his Intentions to restore him to the Possession of Modena and Reggio ; but as to this Point, on a Representation to his Holiness of the Importance of the Affair, and from the Example of his Predecessors, what an Infamy such a Step would cast upon his Name, he became more and more averse to restore those Cities.

AT this Time the Castle of Milan Castle of Milan labouring under a Scarcity of every Thing surrendered to, excepting Bread, and the Garrison being very sickly, capitulated to surrender on Caesar. Condition of Safety to Persons and Effects, if it were not relieved by the 14th Day of April, at which Term the Capitulation being observed, most of the People in the Place were found to be dead. Cæsar

A. D. 1523. consented that the Castle should be resigned into the Hands of Francesco Sforza, the Duke, for which he was highly commended by the Italians. And now the French had nothing left in their Possession in Italy but the Castle of Cremona, which was still abundantly provided with Necessaries. These Successes however were no Relief to the Miseries of the Inhabitants of the Milanese, who were extremely grieved by the Cæsarean Army, because they did not receive their Pay. For the same Reason, when they were on their March to take up their Quarters in Asti and in its Territory, they mutinied, and plundered all the Country as far as Vigevano; so that the Milanese, to put a Stop to these Devastations, and to save the Country from being entirely ruined, were constrained to promise them their Pay at certain Terms, which amounted to about One Hundred Thousand Ducats. These Hardships, however, did not in the least mitigate the Hatred of the People towards the French, being kept steady, partly by Fear, remembering the Injuries they they had received from that Nation, A. D. and partly by Hopes that whenever the ^{1523.} Danger of a fresh Attack from the King of France upon that State was ceased, they should be eased of so great a Burden, because there would be no Necessity for Cæsar to keep any standing Forces in the Milaneſe.

AT this ſame Time was under conti- Peace ne-nual Negotiation an Agreement between gotiated Cæſar and the Venetians, which on ac- between count of the many Difficulties that aroſe, Cæſar and the various Delays interpoſed by them, the Vene- kept the Friends of both Parties in Suſ- tians. penſe concerning the Iſſue. This Tedi-ouſneſs, and perhaps alſo the Difficulty of the Negotiation were increaſed by the Death of Girolamo Adorno, who being a Perſon of a great Spirit and Experience, tho' a young Man, managed the Treaty with Authority, and with ſingular Dexterity. In his Room was ſent from Milan, with a Commiſſion from Cæſar, Marino Carracciolo, the Apoſtolical Protonota-ry, who many Years after was by Pope

A. D. Paul III. advanced to the Dignity of 1523. the Cardinalship. This Treaty, which was carried on at Venice, was under Debate many Months, becaule on the other Side the King of France by his Ambassadors, laboured with the greatest Diligence and Assiduity in opposing it, sometimes promising by Letters, sometimes by trusty Agents, to pass into Italy with a very potent Army. On this Occasion there was great Variety of Opinions among the Senators, and continual Disputes; for many advised not to abandon the Confederacy with the King, in Confidence that he would soon send an Army into Italy.
 This Hope the King endeavouring with the utmost Industry to cherish, had, besides many others, lately sent to Venice Renzo da Ceri, to make the same Promise, and to signify that the Preparations were in Readiness. Others from Experience of past Events, considering that King's Negligence in executing his Projects, could not persuade themselves that his Passage could take Effect; and they were confirmed in this Opinion by the Letters of Giovanni

Giovanni Badoaro, their Ambassador in France, who giving Credit to what had ^{A. D. 1523.} been reported to him of the Duke of Bourbon, (who had already very secretly conspired against the King, and wished that the Venetians would join with Cæsar) assured them that the King of France would neither pass in Person, nor send an Army this Year into Italy. Others were intimidated by the ill Success of the King, and by the good Fortune of Cæsar, and with the Consideration that the Duke of Milan, the Genoeſe and the Florentines, with all Tuscany espoused the Party of Cæsar, and it was believed that the Pope would do the same: And out of Italy, Cæsar was in close Alliance with the Archduke of Austria his Brother, a Neighbour to the Venetian State, and with the King of England, who was continually making War in Picardy. In this Variety of Opinions among the principal Members of the Senate as well as others, the Maturity of Affairs, and the most pressing Instances of the Ambassadors of Cæsar not admitting of any further Delay in coming to a Resolution, the Council of

A. D. the Pregadi was at last convoked in order 1523. to determine their Choice. Here Andrea Gritti, a Person of the highest Authority in that Republic for his Administration of the most important Affairs, and his many remarkable Exploits, and whose Name was very famous over all Italy and in the Courts of foreign Princes, made a Speech, as it is said, in Substance as follows.

Speech of “ Though I am sensible, most excellent Andrea Senators, there is cause to fear that if Gritti. I should give my Advice not to separate ourselves from our Confederacy with the King of France, some may understand by it that I am more influenced with respect to the long Conversation I have had with the French than by a regard to the Commonwealth, I shall not however forbear on that account to express my Mind freely as it is the Right and Duty of a good Citizen; nay, that Citizen and Senator is of no Service who, for any Reason whatsoever, shews himself backward in persuading others to what he thinks in his own Mind to be for the Benefit

Benefit of the Republic. I persuade myself however that this Interpretation ^{A. D. 1523.} will not take Place with Men of Prudence, because they will consider not only what have been my Manners and Actions at all Times, but also that I have never treated with the King of France, or with his Ministers, but as your Minister, and by your Commission and Orders. But besides this I shall be justified, if I deceive not myself by the Probability of the Reasons which induce me to embrace this Opinion. We are debating whether we ought to make a new Confederacy with Cæsar, contrary to the Faith we have given, and to the Obligations of the Confederacy in which we are engaged with the King of France; a Point which, in my Opinion, means no other than to establish the Power of Cæsar, already formidable to every one, in such a Manner as that it being impossible for us to find any further Remedy for moderating or repressing it, we shall see it continually increasing to our manifest Prejudice. We have no Reason that can justify this Resolution, for the King has

B 4

A. D. has always observed our Confederacy, 1523. and if the Effects have not answered in being so ready as we could wish to renew the War in Italy, it is very well known that, since he was stimulated to do it, by his own Interest, there can be no other Cause for his Backwardness than the Impediments which he has met with, and still finds in the Kingdom of France, which indeed have been sufficient to make him defer his Designs, but will never be able wholly to crush them. For so ardent is his Desire to recover the State of Milan, so great is his Power, that as soon as he has repelled the first Efforts of his Enemies, which he will easily sustain, nothing will retard him from sending afresh a very great Force on this Side the Mountains. We have before our Eyes in both these respects the repeated Example of King Lewis, who, when France was attacked by Armies much more potent than those which at present molest it, almost the whole World having conspired against him, by the Greatness of his Force, the Strength of the Places on his Frontiers, and the Fidelity of his People, easily defended fended himself, and when all Men were ^{A. D.} of Opinion that the Fatigues of the War ^{1523.} must have laid him under a Necessity of taking some time for Rest, on a sudden he descended into Italy with powerful Armies. Did not the present King do the same in the Beginning of his Reign, when every one believed that because he was newly come to the Crown, and found the royal Treasury exhausted by the infinite Expences of his Predecessor, he must have been under a Necessity of deferring the War to another Year? We ought not therefore to be intimidated by this Slowness, nor would it be a sufficient Excuse for our Variations, since our Confederate is not retarded by his Will but by the Impediments that have intervened, not from any just Cause that we have to complain of his Conjunction, nor from any decent Pretence afforded us to separate ourselves from his Alliance. This Resolution demands of us a Regard to Decency, a Regard to the Dignity of the Venetian Senate; but it requires no less a Regard to our Utility, or rather to our Safety. For who is so ignorant as not to

A. D.
1523.

 to know of what great Benefit it may be to us, and from how many Dangers it may free us, if the King of France recovers the State of Milan, and what a peaceful Situation for many Years it may produce in our Affairs? This we may learn from the Example of what happened but a few Years ago, when the Recovery of the Milanese by that King was the Cause that we, who before at a vast Expence and Hazard attended to the Defence of Padoua and Trevigi, recovered Brescia and Ve- rona; was the Cause that, while he kept quiet Possession of that Dutchy, we enjoyed absolute Peace and Security in all our Dominions. These are Examples that ought to have much greater Weight with us than the antient Memory of the League of Cambray, for the Kings of France have learned by Experience, what they had not comprehended by Reason, the great Damage they would receive by being separated from our Alliance; a Point of which they will without comparison be more sensible at the present Juncture, in which that King has for a Rival an Emperor, Sovereign of so many Kingdoms, doms, and of such Greatness, whose ^{A. D.} Power will necessitate him to desire and ^{1523.} to set the highest Value upon our Confederacy. But on the contrary who is he that sees not, and knows not in what a dangerous Situation our Affairs will remain as soon as the King of France shall be totally excluded from making any Attempt upon Italy? Who can hinder Cæsar from appropriating to himself or to his Brother the Dutchy of Milan, of which he has not to this Day ever granted the Investiture to Francesco Sforza? And if, as it is very plain, he will have the Power to do it, what Security can be given of his Will? Who is he that can promise that, since the Dutchy of Milan serves as Stairs for ascending to the Empire of all Italy, Cæsar will be more influenced by a Regard to Justice and Honour, than by Ambition, and a Covetousness proper and natural to all great Princes? Shall we perhaps be secured by the Moderation and Temperance of his Ministers in Italy, who are almost all Spaniards, a deceitful and most rapacious Nation, and insatiable above all others? If Cæsar then or Ferdinando

A. D. dinando his Brother should appropriate 1523. Milan, what will be the Condition of our State, when furrounded by them on the Side of Italy, and of Germany? What Remedy can we expect for our Dangers, the Kingdom of Naples being in his Hands, the Pope and the other States of Italy his Dependants, and every one of our Friends so exhausted of Money, and bare of Troops, that no Assistance can be hoped from them? But if the King of France should get Possession of the Dutchy of Milan, Affairs resting in a Balance between two such Princes, whoever should have Reason to be apprehensive of the Power of one would be regarded and Supported by that of the other: And even the Fear alone of his Coming secures all others, since it constrains the Imperialists to lie still, and not to employ themselves in any Enterprize. Wherefore it seems to me that we are rather to laugh than to be terrified at the Vanity of those who threaten that, if we confederate not with Cæ- sar, they will turn their Arms against us, as if to engage in a War with the Venetian Senate were an easy Undertaking, and there there was Reason to hope for a speedy A. D.

Victory, and as if it were a Means for ^{1523.} preventing the Passage of the King of France, and not rather a Cause of the contrary: For who doubts that, when they have provoked us, we shall be obliged to propose such Conditions to the King as would induce him to pass, even tho' he were of himself averse to it. Was not this the very Case in the Time of King Lewis, when their Injuries and treacherous Dealings induced us to stimulate that King, when I from his Prisoner became your Ambassador, that at a Juncture when he was most apprehensive of being very powerfully attacked in France, he sent his Army tho' with ill Fortune, into Italy? Can you imagine that if the Imperialists had thought that the Way to procure them our Friendship, or to keep the King of France out of Italy, was to fall upon us, they would have hitherto delayed to begin Hostilities, because perhaps their Generals had no covetous Desires to enrich themselves with Plunder and the Gains of War, or else perhaps were under no Necessity of easing the Country

Country of their Friends of its Burden of quartering Troops, of getting Money for disburthening it, and to maintain the Army upon free Quarters in the Territories of others? But they have found by Experience that our Power renders it too difficult to force us to this Inconvenience, and they know it is not for their Interest, who are every Day apprehensive of a War with the King of France, to involve themselves in another War, and to give Occasion to a State powerful in Forces and Money, from the Greatness of their Injuries, to stimulate a French Invasion. While they remain in these Doubts and Jealousies they will not seize on the Dutchy of Milan for themselves, nor ever after affront us but with vain Menaces. If we secure them from these Apprehensions it will lie in their Power to accomplish either, and if they should put their Scheme in Execution, as' probably they will, of whom can we chiefly complain but of ourselves and of our excessive Timidity, and immoderate Desire of Peace?
 Peace indeed is desirable, and a Blessing, when it is secure from Jealousies, when it increases not the Danger, and when it induces Men to think themselves at Liberty to enjoy Rest, and to free themselves from Expences. But when it produces contrary Effects, it is, under the insidious Name of Peace, a pernicious War, and under the Name of a wholesome Medicine, a destructive Poison. Wherefore if our joining in Confederacy with Cæsar excludes the King of France from making an Attempt upon Italy, we give Cæsar the Liberty of seizing at his Pleasure on the Dutchy of Milan, and when he is once possessed of that State to study our Destruction. Hence it will follow that, with the greatest Reproach to our Name, and with the Violation of the Faith of this Republic, we purchase the Aggrandisement of a Prince who has extended his Ambition no less than his Power, and who pretends with his Brother that all we possess on the Terra Firma belongs to them; and that we exclude from Italy a Prince whose greatness is a Security to all others, and who would be necessitated to continue in the strictest Union with us. Now a Person who proposes such evident and

A. D.

1523.

A. D.
1523: and palpable Reasons cannot be charged as under the Influence of a new Affection, rather than of Truth, or of private Interest, rather than of Love to the Republic, of whose Safety we have no Reason to doubt if it shall please GOD to grant so much Success to your Resolutions as he has bestowed Wisdom on this most excellent Senate.”

BUT Giorgio Cornaro, a Citizen of equal Authority, and of as high a Reputation for Wisdom, as any Member of that Senate, made the following Speech in Opposition to this Advice.

“ THE present Debate most illustrious Senators, is certainly of very great Importance, and very difficult. And yet when I consider the Ambition and Faithlessness of the Princes of our Times, and the Incongruity of their Nature with the Nature of Republics, which not being governed by the Will of a single Person, but by the Consent of many, proceed with more Moderation, and with greater Respects, nor ever arbitrarily depart, as is frequent frequent with Princes, from what has ^{A. D.} some Appearance of Justice and Honour, ^{1523.} I cannot but conclude with myself that it must be very pernicious to us that the Dutchy of Milan should be under a Prince more powerful than ourselves. For such a Vicinity will of Necessity keep us under continual Jealousies and Uneasiness, and tho' we may be at Peace, it will be proper for us to be almost perpetually plotting on War, notwithstanding any Confederacy or Convention that may subsist between us. Of this we find infinite Examples in antient Historians, and some in our own Writers; but what greater and more illustrious Examples can there be than those, the bitter Memory of which is engraven in all our Hearts? This Senate introduced Lewis King of France into the Dutchy of Milan, at which unfortunate Resolution many of us were present. We religiously observed the Articles of our Confederacy with him, tho' we were invited by the Spaniards and Germans with great Rewards, and on different Occasions, to detatch ourselves from him, and were assured that he was of-

A. D. ^{1523.} ten plotting our Destruction. Not the Benefit received, nor the Faith given, nor the perpetual Train of our good Offices for cultivating his Friendship, were capable of mollifying his Spirit, which was entirely bent on our Ruin, for which Purpose he at last reconciled himself with his antient and most bitter Enemies, and joined with them against us in the most pernicious League of Cambrai. To avoid therefore the Dangers which will be continually hanging over our Heads from the insidious and deceitful Neighbourhood of great Princes, it will be necessary for us, if I mistake not, to direct all our Resolutions with a View that the Dutchy of Milan might not fall into the Hands of the King of France nor of the Emperor, but may come into the Possession of Francesco Sforza, or of some other who is not formidable for his Kingdoms or great Dominions. On this Resolution depends the present, and, if the Condition of the Times should alter, the future Augmentation and Aggrandisement of our State. We are not to consult whether we ought to continue in Friendship with the King of France, or

or join in Confederacy with Cæſar: One of theſe two Reſolutions totally excludes Franceſco Sforza from the Dutchy of Milan, and gives Admittance to the King of France, a Prince ſo much more potent than ourſelves; the other tends to confirm and ſecure Sforza in the Poſſeſſion of that Dutchy, which Cæſar propoſes to include as the principal Article of our Confederacy, and has promiſed the King of England to obſerve it. Wherefore if he ſhould attempt to deprive him of that State, he would not only offend us, and the other Italian States, to whom he would give Occaſion to have recourſe once more to the French, but diſoblige the King of England, for whom, all the World knows, he ought to have the greateſt Reſpect, and would beſides provoke the People of the Milaneſe, who are perfectly devoted to Franceſco Sforza. By ſuch a Step he would involve himſelf in a Multitude of Difficulties and Dangers, and highly to his Diſhonour, be guilty of a Breach of Faith, which he has hitherto, for ought that appears, preſerved inviolable, which cannot be ſaid of the French;

A. D.

1523.

A D. nay, what is more, his restoring to 1523. Francesco Sforza, after the Death of Pope Leo, the State of Milan, resigning into his Hands the Fortresses successively as he acquired them, and at last, contrary to what many expected, putting him in Possession of the Castle of Milan, must be taken as manifest Signs that he intends to fulfil his Engagement. Why then should we hesitate in preferring a Resolution which gives us great Hopes of answering our Intentions before one that manifestly tends to an End repugnant to our Views? In Opposition to this we are told it would be more dangerous to this Republic for the Dutchy of Milan to be under the Dominion of the Emperor than of the King of France, because that King, by the Greatness of Cæsar, and the Emulation between them would be in a manner necessitated to persevere in strict Alliance with us; but from Cæsar we may expect quite the contrary, both on account of his Power and of the Claims which he and his Brother pretend to have on our State. I believe that whoever has such an Opinion

on of Cæsar is not deceived, considering A. D. the Nature and Manners of such great ^{1523.} Princes; and I heartily wish he may not deceive himself who has not the same Opinion of the King of France. Many of the same Reasons were in Force under his Predecessor, who was however more swayed by Covetousness and Ambition than by a Sense of Honour, or of his own Profit. Besides the Reasons which might oblige him to continue united with us are not perpetual, but vary from Time to Time, according to the Nature of human Affairs. Cæsar is subject to the common Lot of Mortals, and, like other Princes greater than himself, liable to infinite Accidents of Fortune; and how long ago is it that, when all Spain was in an Insurrection against him he appeared more worthy of Commiseration than Envy? And at least there is not so much Difference between one Danger and another as there is between a Resolution that certainly excludes us from obtaining our End, and one that probably will lead us to its Accomplishment. Moreover the Reasons alledged by the worthy Sena-

A. D. 1523. } tor have a Respect only to future and distant Dangers; but if we consider the present State of Affairs, it is not to be doubted that if we refuse an Alliance with Cæsar we shall immediately expose ourselves to greater Distresses and Dangers. For if we break off our Confederacy with the King of France it is very probable that he will defer his military Operations till a more convenient Time and Opportunity; but if we are in Conjunction with him, he may perhaps think fit immediately to enter upon Action, which will of Necessity create us Trouble and Expence. But in what Case is the War with the King likely to be attended with the greatest Danger to our State? If we join with Cæsar we may almost conclude for certain that the Victory will fall on our Side: An Event which we cannot so well promise ourselves by an Union with the King of France. And by confederating with Cæsar even the Victory of the King would not prove of such dangerous Consequence as would result from a contrary Resolution; for in such a Case the whole Force of

of the victorious Arms will be turned against us, and Cæsar would not only find himself under less Restraint, and fewer Impediments, but prompted in a manner by Necessity, to seize on the Dutchy of Milan. To what is urged concerning our Tie of Confederacy the Answer is easy; for we promised the King of France to defend the States which he possessed in Italy, not to recover them after he had lost them; there is nothing to that Purpose in the Instrument of our Articles, nor do these Reasons at all affect us. We fulfilled our Obligation when at the Loss of Milan, occasioned by their Want of Provisions for its Defence, our Troops suffered more than the French: We fulfilled them when we sent our Forces to the Assistance of Lautrech on his Return with the Swiss. We went beyond our Obligations when we suffered ourselves to be induced by them with vain Hopes and Promises to wait for so many Months together the coming of his Army. If Will detained him, why should we seek to bear the Punishment of his Faults? If Necessity, is not that same

A. D.
1723.

A. D. Reason sufficient to justify us to him, 1523. even tho' we were under any Obligations?
 I know not for what we should be any longer bound to the King of France, since we have first been abandoned by him. I know not what farther is required of one Confederate from another, or how our Dangers can do him any Service. I affirm not that the imperial Generals have at present any Thoughts of going to War with us, nor will I presume to assert the contrary, considering the Necessity they lie under of subsisting the Army on the States of their Neighbours; and the Hopes they may have of drawing us by that Means into an Alliance with them, especially if the King of France should not pass, of which if any one doubts, he has, in my Opinion sufficient Reason for his doubting from the Negligence of the French, and their Want of Money, of which they have been exhausted by the Wars, in which they are engaged beyond the Mountains, with two such Princes. Nor can he be justly blamed who believes this to be true on the Credit of your Ambassadors, for Ambassadors

bassadors are the Eyes and Ears of States. In short I repeat it again as ^{A. D.} ^{1523.} my Opinion that we ought to use our utmost Endeavours, and be most solicitous that the Dutchy of Milan may be settled on Francesco Sforza, whence it will follow that a Resolution which conducts to this End, is more for our Utility than one that totally excludes us from it."

THE Authority of two such Personages, and the Efficacy of their Reasons rather more perplexed than determined the Minds of the Senators, whence the Senate prolonged as much a possible, their coming to a Resolution, induced to this Delay by their own Nature, the Weightiness of the Affair, and a Desire to see first some further Progress of the King of France; many Difficulties also were thrown in their Way arising from a Necessity of their coming to an Agreement with the Archduke. The King of France increased their Doubts and Suspension of Mind by his present careful Attention to the Preparations of War,
and

A. D. and his sending the Bishop of Bayeux, 1523. to intreat them to delay their Resolution for the whole next ensuing Month, declaring that before the End of that Term he would pass into Italy with a greater Army than had ever been seen in that Country within the Memory of Man. While they remained under this Ambiguity, the Doge Antonio Grimano happened to die, and Andrea Gritti was elected in his Room, which was rather a Disservice to the French Interest than otherwise ; for Gritti seated in that high Dignity left the Resolution entirely to the Senate, and would never from that Time, either by Words or Actions, shew himself inclined to either Party. At last the King continually sending to the Senate new Agents with very large Offers, and it being assured that Anne de Montmorency, afterwards Grand Constable of France, and Federigo de Bozzole were coming to Venice on the same Business, the Imperial and English Ambassadors, who were very jealous of this Delay, protested to the Senate that they would depart at the end of three Days, and leave
 the

*Andrea
 Gritti Doge of Venice.*

the whole Affair unfinished. The Senate therefore being under a Necessity ^{A. D. 1523.} of coming to a Resolution, and putting no Faith in the Promises of the King of France, whose Credit was diminished by his having amused them for so many Months together, with vain Hopes, but much more by the Intelligence they received from their Ambassador residing at his Court in contradiction to the Agent's Promises, determined to embrace the Friendship of Cæsar, with whom they made a Convention on the following Conditions.

THAT between Cæsar, Ferdinando Articles of a Treaty between Cæsar and the Venetians. Archduke of Austria, Francesco Sforza Duke of Milan, on one Part, and the Venetian Senate on the other, should be a perpetual Peace and Confederacy: That the Senate should be obliged to send, whenever there should be Occasion, for the Defence of the Dutchy of Milan, Six hundred Men at Arms, Six Hundred Light Horse, and Six Thousand Foot; and the same Force for the Defence of the Kingdom of Naples; in case

A. D. 1523. case it should be molested by any Christian Power; which Limitation was inserted because the Venetians refused to oblige themselves in general to defend that Country, that they might not provoke a War with the Turks. Cæsar entered into the same Obligation to defend whatever was in the Possession of the Venetians in Italy: And the Venetians were to pay the Archduke, on account of old Differences, and of the Agreement made at Worms, in the Space of Eight Years, Two Hundred Thousand Ducats. As soon as this Convention was made the Venetians dismissed from their Service Teodoro da Trivulzio, and elected for Governor General of their Forces, on the same Conditions, Francesco Maria Duke of Urbino.

Duke of Urbino made General of the Venetians.

IT was generally thought all over Italy that the King of France, on hearing that those from whom he expected Assistance were become his Enemies, would lay aside for this Year all Thoughts of invading the Dutchy of Milan; but when it was known known that he not only continued his Preparations but had begun to put his Army in Motion; those who dreaded the Consequences of his Victory, entered into a new Confederacy against him, and prevailed on the Pope to be at the Head of the League.

A. D.

1523.

ADRIAN desirous of a general Peace on his first coming into Italy, had intreated Cæsar and the Kings of France and England to lay down their Arms, so pernicious to the Christian Commonwealth, and especially at a time when the Turks were in such a Career of Success; and that they would send to Rome their respective Ambassadors with full Powers. They all apparently complied at once with his Request, but no sooner began to treat than they found it would be all Labour lost; for a Peace was obstructed by infinite Difficulties, and a short Truce was not pleasing to Cæsar because it procured him no Advantage, and to a long one the King of France would not

A. D. not consent. The Pope therefore influenced either by his ancient Benevolence towards Cæsar, or persuaded that the King of France had no real Thought of coming to an Agreement, began more than usual to give Ear to those who persuaded him not to permit the King to get Possession anew of the Dutchy of Milan.

Cardinal
de' Medici in Favour at Rome.

THE Cardinal de' Medici, who till now had kept himself retired at Florence for fear of a Persecution from his many Adversaries, and especially from the Cardinal of Volterra who seemed to have had a great Sway with the Pope, taking Courage at this change of Measures, came to Rome, and was received with particular Marks of Respect by the greatest Part of the Court. He began immediately to confer with the Duke of Sessa, the Imperial Minister, and the English Ambassadors, and all jointly solicited his Holiness to favour the Cause of Cæsar. Volterra's bad Fortune at this Time, getting as usual the better of his Prudence and of all his Artifices, greatly injured his Affairs, put his Person in Danger, and at the same same Time gave an Opportunity to Cardinal de' Medici to encrease his Favour and Authority with his Holiness, who had hitherto shewn a great Partiality for Volterra, because with great Dexterity, solid Reasons and fine Speeches, he had made him believe he had greatly at Heart the Peace amongst Christian Princes.

A. D.

1523.

BUT when Francesco Imperiali after his Banishment on his Way to France, by means of the Duke of Sessa, was stopped at Castelnuovo, in the Neighbourhood of Rome, in searching his Papers some Letters were found written by Volterra to the Bishop of Sens his Nephew, exhorting him to press the King of France to invade Sicily with a Fleet; which obliging Cæsar to attend to its Defence, would render more easy the Recovery of the Dutchy of Milan. The Pope was amazed at this Discovery, and thinking he had been grossly deceived, and at the same Time being vehemently solicited by the Duke of Sessa, and Cardinal de' Medici, he sent for Volterra, confined him in Castel Sant Angelo, and gave Orders to have

A. D. have him tried as a Delinquent against the 1523. Pontifical Majesty, for inviting the King of France to forcibly attack Sicily, a Fief of the Holy See. The Proceſs however was carried on but ſlowly, and after he had been examined, was allowed Council to plead : But the ſame Moderation was not practiſed in regard to his Effects, for the Day he was arreſted Adrian ſeized on all the Goods and Money in his Houſe. By means of the Cardinal's Imprisonment a Plot alſo was diſ-covered of ſome Sicilians in favour of France, for which Count Camerata, Maef-tro Portulano, and the Treafurer of the Iſland were quartered.

THIS Proceeding had greatly incenſed Adrian againſt the King, and after conſulting for ſeveral Days the Cardinal de' Medici, at laſt the Rumour continually increaſing of his Majesty's Deſigns, he came to a Reſolution of oppoſing him, and in a Conſistory, after expatiating on the imminent Danger of Chriſtendom from the Grand Turk, on account of the King of France's Obſtinacy in reſuſing to come into into the Truce in Agitation, which would ^{A. D.} have removed all Apprehensions, it was he ^{1523.} said, the Business of the Vicars of CHRIST, Successors of the Prince of the Apostles, to be anxious for the Preservation of the Peace amongst the Faithful, and therefore his Zeal for the public Welfare, obliged him to join those who laboured to prevent Disturbances in Italy; because on that depended the Peace of the whole World. Conformable to the Intent of this Harangue, on the Third Day of August, the Vice King of Naples being come to Rome for that Purpose, a League and Confederacy was signed between the Pope, the Emperor, the King of England, the Archduke, the Duke of Milan, the Cardinal de' Medici with the Florentines and the Genoese, for the Defence of Italy, to last during the Life of the Confederates, and a Year after any one of their Deaths, and Room was left for any Prince to accede, provided it were with the Approbation of the Pope, Cæsar, the King of England, and the Archduke, and should give Security that he would prosecute his Pretensions by the Way

A League between Adrian and other Powers against France.

VOL. VIII. D of

A. D. of Justice and not by Force of Arms.

^{1523.} That for the Defence of any of the Confederates who might be attacked in Italy an Army should be raised; that the Pope, should furnish Two Hundred Men at Arms, Cæsar Eight Hundred, the Florentines Two Hundred, the Duke of Milan Two Hundred, and also Two Hundred Light Horse. That the Pope, Cæsar, and the Duke of Milan should provide the Artillery and Ammunition, and be at all the Charges attending them. That for the Maintainance of the Foot and other Expences of the Army, the Pope, the Duke of Milan, and the Florentines should contribute each Twenty Thousand Ducats per Month, the Emperor Thirty Thousand, the States of Genoa, Siena, and Lucca Ten Thousand between them. The Genoese besides were to pay the Cost of their Marine, and for what Troops were necessary to defend their own Dominions. That every one's Quota should be paid for Three Months certain, and as long after as the Pope, jointly with the Emperor and the King of England, should declare it necessary. That
the

THE WARS IN ITALY.

51

the Pope and Cæſar ſhould have the Nomination of a Captain General; and the Vice King of Naples was expected to be the Man, eſpecially as he was propoſed by the Cardinal de' Medici, who was in great Repute with the Emperor, and bore a great Malice againſt Proſpero Colonna. The Marquis of Mantoua was but indirectly admitted into this Confederacy, becauſe the Pope and Florentines, had conſtituted him their General at their own Charge.

A. D.

1523.

BUT neither the League which the Venetians had made with the Emperor, nor the Union of ſo many Potentates contracted with ſuch vaſt Proviſions were able to cool the Ardor of the King of France, who, lately arrived at Lions, was bent on paſſing into Italy with a numerous Army, where the very Rumour of his Coming had begun to excite new Tumults.

Lione, Brother to Alberto Pio, recovered by Surpriſe the Town of Carpi, which was negligently guarded by Giovanni Coſcia, who had been placed there by Proſpero Colonna, to whom the Empe-

Lione

takes

Carpi.

A. D. 1523. ror had given that Town, after declaring Alberto a Rebel of the Empire.

Bonifacio Visconti attempts to murder
the Duke
of Milan.

BUT a greater Accident had like to have happened in the Dutchy of Milan; for as Francesco Sforza was riding on a Mule from Monza to Milan, his Horse-guards following at a Distance that he might be less annoyed with the Dust raised by the Horses, which is very troublesome in the Plains of Lombardy during the Summer; Bonifacio Visconti, a young Man more regarded for the Name of his Family than for his Riches, Honours, or other good Qualities, being near him mounted on a mettlesome Turkish Horse, when he came to a Place where Four Roads meet, giving his Horse a sudden Jerk struck at the Duke's Head with a Dagger: But not being able to keep his fiery Horse steady, and the Mule starting at the same Time he missed of his Aim, and Bonifacio being much the taller and on a larger Beast, the Dagger directed to the Head grazed on the Back. Bonifacio then drawing his Sword made another Stroke, Stroke, but that also grazing only with A. D. the Edge of the Blade on his Side, he ^{1523.} received no Hurt. By this Time the Duke's Retinue coming up, Visconti rode away, and tho' pursued by the Guards, by the goodness of his Steed got safe into Piedmont. What induced him to perpetrate so wicked a Fact, was that a few Months before Monsignorino Visconti was assassinated in Milan by Girolamo Morone, and, as was said, at the Duke's Instigation: If Fortune had rewarded this cunning and bold Attempt, we must have beheld an Example which has very rarely or never before happened, that on the public Road at Noon Day, so great a Prince, attended by so numerous and armed a Guard, in the Midst of his Dominions, should fall by the Hands of a single Man, and that the Assassin should make his Escape. * The Duke thus wound-

D 3

ed

* Visconti owed the Duke a Grudge for being broke at the Siege of the Castle of Milan, and afterwards for being refused the Government of a Town; and lastly for the Death of Astorre Visconti here called Monsignorino, who was his Uncle.

A. D. returned to Monza, being fully persuaded that there was some Plot carrying on against him at Milan; Prospero, and Morone entertained the same Suspicion, and instantly sent to apprehend Visconti's Brother the Bishop of Alessandria, who, without any Resistance, trusting to Prospero's Honour, delivered himself up to him, and after Examination was committed to the Castle of Cremona. But the Opinions of the Public were various as to his being conscious or not of the Fact.

Valenza
taken by Birago.

ABOUT this very Time Galeazzo Birago with other Milanese Exiles, assisted by some French Soldiers that were in Piedmont, was admitted into Valenza, through the Treachery of the Governor, a Savoyard, but Antonio da Leva, taking with him some light Horse and the Spanish Foot that were in Asti, instantly laid Siege to the Town, which being in a weak Condition, and the Enemy not having had Time to fortify it, after planting the Artillery he reduced in two Days, and had the same Success with the Castle, having killed and retaken by Leva.

26.

killed in the Two Assaults above Four A. D.
 Hundred Men, and taken many Prisoners, ^{1523:} amongst the rest Birago the Author of these Disturbances.

THE French Army all this While Bourbon's was passing the Alps, and was to be ^{Plot.} followed by the King, who was prevented by the Discovery of a Plot formed by the Duke of Bourbon, who for his Nobility, being of the Blood Royal, for his vast Estate, for the Dignity of his Office of Great Constable, and for the universal Fame of his Valour, was the first and most regarded Personage in the Kingdom of France : He had been out of the Royal Favour for some Years, and on that account was not let into the Secrets of the Cabinet, nor trusted in those Posts to which his Dignity seemed to intitle him. To this was added, that the King's Mother, on some old Claims, solicited the Parliament of Paris to decree away his Estate in her Favour. The Duke finding he could obtain no Redress from the King, full of Resentment, by the Means of Bu-

A. D. ^{1523.} ren the Emperor's Confident, and Great Chamberlain, had entered very secretly into a Confederacy, a few Months before, with Cæsar and the King of England, and to consolidate this Alliance Cæsar agreed to give him in Matrimony, his Sister Eleonora, the Widow of Emanuel King of Portugal. The Execution of the Plot depended on the King's going in Person to the War, which was artfully promoted by the King of England, who made him believe that he might rest secure of his not molesting the Kingdom of France that year; as soon as Francis had passed the Mountains, Bourbon was to enter Burgundy with Twelve Thousand Foot, who, with German and English Money, were already secretly inlisting. Bourbon was confident that, when once the King was absent from the Kingdom, he should accomplish his Ends. Of the Conquests that he should make in France, he was to keep for himself, Provence, which he claimed thro' the Rights of the Anjouins, and it was to be created into a Kingdom in his Favour; all the rest of the conquered Places

THE WARS IN ITALY.

57

Places were to remain to the King. of England. A. D.
1523.

THE Duke in order to excuse his not attending his Majesty into Italy, stopped at Moulins, where he feigned himself sick ; the King, in passing thro' that Town in his Way to Lions, having received some blind Intimation of this Plot, frankly told the Duke, that some People had endeavoured to render his Conduct suspicious, but that he could rest secure on his experienced Virtues and Loyalty. The Duke returned most humble Thanks to his Majesty for treating him with so much Freedom and Confidence, then thanking God for giving him a King incapable of being prepossessed by idle Stories and false Calumnies, promised that as soon as his Health would permit, which, from the Slightness of the Indisposition he had Reason to think might be in a few Days, he should follow him to Lions, and accompany him wherever he went.

BUT

A. D.

1523.

The Plot
discovered

BUT the King was no sooner arrived at Lions, than he received Intelligence that, on the Frontiers of Burgundy, there were assembling a Number of German Foot, which, adding to his former Suspicions, and some intercepted Letters making a clearer Discovery, he ordered San Valerio, Boiss, the Brothers of Palisse, the Master of the Posts, and the Bishop of Autun to be apprehended as Accomplices, and the Grand Master was sent with Four Hundred Horse and Four Thousand Foot to Moulins to secure the Duke of Bourbon, but was too late, for Bourbon suspecting a Discovery, and fearing the Passes might be guarded, had, in a disguised Habit, got into Franche Compté.

Bonivette goes into Italy with the Army.

THIS important Discovery put off the King's Journey into Italy, but did not however prevent him, after retaining part of the Forces designed for the new War, from sending thither Bonivette the Admiral of France, at the Head of Eighteen Hundred Lances, Six Thousand Swiss,

Swiss, Two Thousand Gascons, Two A. D.
 Thousand Valeffe, Six Thousand Ger- ^{1523.} mans, Twelve Thousand French, and Three Thousand Italians, who passing the Mountains with this Army, after approaching the State of Milan, made a Feint as if he intended to march to Novara, and as that City was unprovided with Men, and had no Out-works, the Duke of Milan sent Orders to surren- Novara der the Town, but not the Castle. Vi- surrenders gevano for the same Reason acted in the and Vig- same manner, so that all the Country be- vano. yond the Tesino came into the Possession of the French.

PROSPERO COLONNA, who was labouring under a tedious Infirmary, did not imagine that, after the Venetians had entered into a Confederacy against the King of France, and Bourbon's Plot had been discovered, Francis would persist in his Resolution of assaulting the Dutchy of Milan this Year ; and on this Supposition he had not proceeded with proper Diligence in getting together his Men, who were dispersed in several Places, nor had

A. D.
1523. had he made any other necessary Preparations against such an Invasion. But now on the approach of the Enemy he earnestly attended to assemble his Troops in order to dispute the passage of the Tesino, forgetful of what had happened to himself, when on a like Occasion he had endeavoured to prevent Lautrech from crossing the Adda; and thought he was so sure of Success, that he took no Care to repair the Bastions and Fences of the Suburbs of Milan, which having been totally neglected were in a ruinous Condition. He drew together his whole Force on the Ground which lies on the River between Biagrassà, Bufaloro, and Turbico, a Situation convenient for the Defence of Pavia and Milan. But the French who were at Vigevano found the Waters much lower than Prospero expected, and at Four Miles Distance began to pass the River, part of them waded, whilst others crossed in small Boats; they laid also a Bridge for the Conveniency of the Artillery, at a Place where they met with no Guard nor Obstacle. On this unforeseen Accident Prospero being obliged to alter his whole System, sent immediately Antonio da Leva with One Hundred Men at Arms, and Three Thousand Foot to defend Pavia, and with the Remainder of the Army retired himself to Milan, where in a Council of War it was unanimously allowed that Milan was not tenable if the French without Delay directed thither their March, because the Bastions and Fortifications of the Suburbs, having been neglected ever since the last War, lay mostly in ruins. That the Confidence with which Prospero had undertaken to defend the Passage of the Tesino, had been the Occasion that the necessary Reparations had been neglected, and that it would take up Three Days Time to put the Fortifications in a State of Defence. That they ought to take this whole Affair into their Consideration and then immediately set about the Reparations, but at the same Time, lest the French should come upon them the First, Second, or Third Day, he prepared to retired to Como, if they marched by the Way of Pavia, or to Pavia if they came by Como.
to

A. D.
1523.
Antonio da Leva at Pavia—Prospero retires to Milan.

A. D.

1523.

The French lose the Opportunity of taking Milan.

BUT the evil Genius of the French, darkening as usual their Intellects, would not permit them the Profit of so fine an Opportunity ; for either out of Negligence, or waiting till the whole Army was assembled (for a great Part was not yet come up) they continued Three days on the Tesino, and then joining together all their Forces between Milan, Pavia, and Binasco, marched to San Cristofaro a place situated but a Mile from Milan, between the Roman and Tesin Gates. The Pioneers having cleared the Way they planted the Artillery in their Front, making believe they were moving to assault Milan, but without making any further Attempt, they pitched their Camp in that Place, and after a few Days removed it to the Abbey of Chiaravalle, where they destroyed the Mills and cut the Pipes that supplied Milan with Water, proposing to themselves a Siege rather than an Assault ; for besides the vast Number of People who had taken up Arms with a settled Aversion to the Name of the King of France, there were in Milan Eight Hundred Men at

at Arms, Eight Hundred Light Horse, A. D.
 Four Thousand Spanish Foot, Six Thou- ^{1523.} sand Five Hundred Germans, and Three Thousand Italians.

IN the Midst of these Broils died Pope ^{Death of} Adrian on the 14th Day of September, to ^{Adrian.} the no small Detriment of the Confederates, who were deprived not only of the Pontifical Authority, but also of the Subsidies for which, by the Articles of the Treaty, he was engaged. He left behind him no great Esteem of his Abilities, either because his Reign was short, or that he had little Experience in Affairs; his Death was no way displeasing to the Courtiers, who wished to see the Papal Chair filled with an Italian, at least with a Person educated in their Country. Adrian's Death caused some Disturbances in the ecclesiastic State, where, during his Life, some Sparks were discovered which prognosticated a future Combustion, and would then have dilated themselves if, partly by Accident and partly by Care, they had not been prevented.

A. D.

1523.

Alberto Pio Governor of Reggio and Rubiera.

The Historian Governor of Modena and Reggio.

THE College of Cardinals before the Pope's Arrival into Italy, had committed the Care of Reggio and Rubiera to Alberto Pio, who under divers Pretences and Excuses continued to keep Possession of their Castles, having taken Occasion of Adrian's little Experience, to despise his Orders. He had also agreed that, as soon as War broke out, Renzo da Ceri with a Party of Horse and a good Body of Foot should quarter at Rubiera, and from thence make Excursions, when Opportunity offered, on the Roman Road between Modena and Reggio in order to intercept the Money and Dispatches which should be transmitted to Milan from Naples, Rome, and Florence, and be at hand for undertaking any Thing of Importance when Occasion offered. But Francesco Guicciardini the Governor of those Towns, having in Time dived into the Design, had made Adrian sensible of the End for which Alberto accompanied his Requests with such smooth Speeches, and of the Dangers to which the ecclesiastic State on that Side would be exposed.

posed, obtained that the Pope, enraged at Alberto's Proceedings, by Threats of A. D. 1523. using Force obliged him to restore the Castles, for the Affairs of the French were not in such Forwardness as to enable him to make a Resistance. But those of the Family of the Pii having afterwards got Possession of Carpi, Prospero Colonna in order to recover it, was the Cause that Guido Rangone was taken into the Pay of the Confederates with One Hundred Men at Arms, One Hundred Light Horse, and One Thousand Foot, and that the Duke of Sessa, who had enlisted One Thousand Spaniards at Rome, which were to join the rest at Milan, was ordered to stop with them at Modena.

IN the mean Time Renzo da Ceri, whose Fame together with Hopes of Plunder had drawn about him great Numbers of Horse and Foot, began to make Excursions, and infest the whole Country, and unexpectedly one Night, after the Pope's Death, attempted with Two Thousand Men to take Rubiera, but the Gar-

A. D. 1523. rison behaving gallantly, he found that Place was not to be easily taken by Storm, Tristano, a Corfican, one of his Captains of Foot, was made a Prisoner in the Assault. Renzo's Troops assembled afterwards on several Occasions in these Parts, and were the Cause of Undertakings of greater Moment, for after the Pope's Death the Duke of Ferrara, tired with vain Promises, so often made him of the Restoration of his Towns, and finding that by the Absolution he had procured from Adrian, it was less difficult to obtain a Pardon for what he had forcibly taken, than a Restoration of what he had lost, and having fully persuaded himself of what was the universal Belief, that on account of the Dissentions which since Leo's Death, had been ever encreased among the Cardinals, the Election of a new Pope would be carried to a great Length, he determined to attend to the Recovery of Reggio and Modena. Amongst the many Opportunities for accomplishing his Scheme, was offered that of conveniently joining with Renzo da Ceri, who had already already got together Two Hundred Horse, A. D. and above Two Thousand Foot, he ^{1523.} therefore enlisted Three Thousand Men, and after sending Ten Thousand Ducats to Renzo, marched towards Modena, which had no other Garrison than Count Gajazzo and his Troops, which had been hired by the Confederates. Tho' the Inhabitants of Modena detested the Government of the Family d' Este, yet as the Walls were weak, and built after the old Fashion without Bastions, the Ditches filled up, and no Sort of Reparations had been made for a long time, there seemed a Necessity for a larger Garrison, wherefore the Governor and the Count, after composing the Differences which had for some Time subsisted between them, unanimously persuaded the Spanish Foot (which after entering Tuscany, came on but slowly, and had hitherto given them various and ambiguous Answers whether they would stop at Modena or proceed forwards) and at last after many Entreaties prevailed on them to enter the Town. The Duke of Ferrara, who was arrived at Fi- nale with Two Hundred Men at Arms,

A. D. Four Hundred Light Horse and ^{1523.} Three Thousand Foot, being apprised of the Introduction of the Spaniards, was inclined to proceed no farther, but as he had no Certainty of the Fact, and hoping at least that he might by his Conjunction with Renzo obtain Reggio, and not despairing also but that some Disorder might arise amongst the Enemies Infantry on account of their Arrears, he resolved to advance. Nor did he entertain such Hopes on light Grounds, for the College of Cardinals, who by the Governor had been apprised of his imminent Danger, made no Sort of Provision, nor indeed returned any Answer to his Letters and Expresses, and it was not in his Power to content the Soldiers with the public Money, for the Day was come in which the second Month's Pay was due to the Spaniards, and had he been able to raise the Money he could have no Hopes of enlisting more Men, and by dividing the Soldiers between Modena and Reggio neither of these Towns would be safe, for Reggio had no Garrison, and the Dispo-

Disposition of the People was quite different from that of the Modenese. A. D.
1523.

IN this Perplexity the Governor and Count Guido, after judging it was more prudent to preserve Modena as a Town of greater Importance for its Vicinity to Bologna, more united to the ecclesiastic State, and which lay more convenient for receiving Succours and Provisions, sent Five Hundred Men to Reggio under Vincenzo Maiatto of Bologna, an Officer of Count Guido, with Orders to retire into the Citadel if the Town could not be preserved, as they had some Hopes it might, at least for some Days; they sent also some Money to the Governor Giovan Battista Smeraldo, of Parma, to enable him to get together Three Hundred Men, and they tried but in vain to prevail on the Community of Reggio to contribute a Sum for raising more Men, as they were necessary not only for the Defence of the ecclesiastic State but also for their own Security.

A. D.

1523.

Guicciardini'sSpeech to the *Mode-
nese*.

WHEN the Governor of Modena found that without Money he could not well preserve the Town, he assembled a good Number of the Citizens and acquainted them, that Affairs were reduced to such a Crisis, that since for want of Money the Spanish Foot could not be paid, nor other Necessaries provided, the Town must of course come into the Hands of the Duke of Ferrara which otherwise might defend itself. That there was no Method of guarding against this Calamity, if they themselves did not take upon them to prevent the present Danger, for he was well assured, that the new Pope, or the College of Cardinals would for the future effectually provide for their Defence. He said there was not one present who had not experienced both the Government of the Duke and that of the Church, and therefore it would be Time lost to make use of Arguments and Reasonings to convince them of what they allowed. He only begged they would not make any Difficulty of lending him the Sum he

THE WARS IN ITALY.

he now required, which was but a ⁷¹ A. D. trifle both to each Particular, and to the ^{1523.} Public, in comparison to the Change of a Government under which they were happy.

THIS Speech being agreeable to the Audience, who were of the same Sentiments, they raised that very Day Five Hundred Ducats by a Tax laid on themselves, with which the Spaniards being paid, and other Necessaries procured, they were in no farther Danger from the Duke of Ferrara, who not laying a greater Stress on his Forces than they deserved, leaving Modena on his left, and joining Renzo in his Way, proceeded to Reggio, where he was received without Difficulty, and the next Day the Governor of the Citadel surrendered a little after the Cannon had began firing, alledging for his Excuse that Majatto whom he had sent for had refused to come to his Assistance, and that the Money sent him by the Governor of Modena, had been seized near Parma where he was recruiting.

A. D.

1523.

As soon as the Duke had got Possession of Reggio, the Admiral recalled Renzo da Ceri which greatly lessened the Duke's Forces, who however after lying some Days along the Secchia undertook the Siege of Rubiera, where the Count Guido had placed old da Coviano with Two Hundred Foot. The Duke had small Hopes of Success, for the Place tho' small, had strong Fortifications, the Ditches being deep and wide, and the Walls were surrounded by Ramparts of Earth, yet the next Day, as soon as the Artillery began to play against a Part of the Wall contiguous to the Gate, the Governor, either because he had so secretly agreed, or else intimidated because his Men began to be tumultous, jumped down from the Walls and presented himself to the Duke, to whom he made a tender of himself and of the Town. The Duke entered the Place, and had no sooner planted the Cannon against the Castle than the Commander whose Name was Tito Tagliaferro, a Parmesan, was so terrified, that notwithstanding it was sufficiently sufficiently provided with Men, Artillery and all Neccessaries, he surrendered without standing a single Shot. The Duke then put his Army into Quarters in Hopes that, on account of a long Vacancy of the Roman See, the Troops in Modena would disband, as also because he had farther Expectations, as will be after related.

IN the mean Time Bonivette, who was encamped at San Cristofano in a Place surrounded by Waters and Ditches between the Tesin and Roman Gates, despairing of making himself Master of Milan, after taking of Monza had sent Monf. Bayarde and Federigo da Bozzole with Three Hundred Lances and Eight Thousand Foot to Lodi, where the Marquis of Mantoua, General of the Ecclesiastic and Florentine Forces, commanded, with Five Hundred Horse and the same Number of Foot; but the Marquis fearing his Person was in Danger, retired to Ponte Vico, and Lodi thus abandoned received the French. Federigo then laid a Bridge on the Adda, and crossing crossing with the same Forces, he went in Succour of the Castle of Cremona, where the famished Garrison not having any Knowledge of the Arrival of a French Army in Italy, the very same Day the Admiral was approaching Milan, had agreed to surrender, if not relieved by the 26th Day of September. Federigo advanced to the Castle without Opposition, and after supplying it with Victuals and all Necessaries resolved to lay Siege to the Town, to which he was encouraged by the smallness of the Garrison left there by Prospero; but the Marquis of Mantoua out of Fear of what might happen, had sent thither One Hundred Men at Arms, One Hundred Light Horse, and Four Hundred Foot. Federigo finding he could not enter Cremona on the Side of the Castle on account of the strong Fortifications erected between the Castle and the Town, turned to the Right, in order to make an attack where the Wall was weakest. After opening a Breach he gave the Assault but was repulsed; then widening the Breach he entered on a second Attack, but meeting

A. D.

1523.

Cremona
besieged.

ing with the same ill Success, he retired to San Martino in order to wait for Renzo da Ceri, who was moved from the Reggian with Two Hundred Horse and Two Thousand Foot. On his Arrival they returned to the Walls which were battered with as great Success as could be wished, but being afterwards incommoded with vast Rains, and finding they could not, without great Hazard, obtain their Intent, they made no farther Attempt. Mercurio at the same Time, with the light Horse of the Venetians, whose Troops were assembling at Ponte Vico, passing the Oglio, made Excursions up to their very Entrenchments. After these vain Attempts finding themselves streightned in Provisions, and Renzo's Men deserting, because they had received no other Money than what had been sent their Leader, quitting Cremona, they went and laid Siege to Sonzino, but with the same ill Success. They afterwards plundered Carravaggio, where they rested some Days; which furnished a Cause or Pretence to the Venetians for not sending

to

A. D.

1523.

Carra-vaggio put to the Sack.

A. D. 1523. to Milan their Supplies according to Engagement, for they gave in Excuse for their Slowness in collecting their Army, the Notion which prevailed amongst the German Officers, that on account of their Separation from France, the French would not pass that Year into Italy, and that they had promised to be in Readiness only when the Troops in the Cremonese should have repassed the River Adda.

WHILST Affairs continued in this Situation each party mistrusting its Ability of putting a speedy End to the War, neither would venture on any Enterprize that might endanger the whole. The Admiral gave himself little concern in carrying on the Siege of Milan, being persuaded that the Enemy would either disband for want of Money, or quit Milan for want of Victuals, for tho' that City was supplied with a great Quantity of Wheat, yet in so populous a Town the Mouths were innumerable, and as the Admiral had cut off the Waters to prevent the working of the Mills, they found great Difficulties ficulties in grinding their Corn *. On A. D. these Considerations he recalled the Troops ^{1523.} in the Gbiaradadda, and posted them between Modena and Milan, so as to prevent any Provisions coming by the Way of the Mountain of Brionza, having already taken Care to prevent their Access by the usual way of Lodi and Pa- via. But all this, as will appear, was not sufficient for his obtaining the desired Effect.

PROSPERO COLONNA labouring under a grievous Infirmary, was no less uneasy in his Mind, under Expectation of the Vice-king, not brooking to be the Second in Command, wherefore desirous of exerting himself, he ordered that all Diligence might be used to cut off the Convoys of Provisions which came to the Enemy from the other Side of the Tesino, since by the Strength of their Entrenchments, it was not practicable to drive them away by Force of Arms :
 And

* The Want of Bread was so great that One Hundred Thousand of the Inhabitants had not a Morsel of Bread for Eight Days, whilst the new Mills were building.

A. D. And for this Purpose he propos'd that 1523: the Marquis of Mantoua should enter Pavia; which rendering the Bridge of the French unsecure, they laid another at Torligo Twenty-five Miles distant from Pavia. Vitelli also earnestly sollicit'd that his Regiment of Florentine Men at Arms which, at the Commencement of the War, had been sent to Genoa, and afterwards in Conjunction with Three Thousand Troops in the Pay of the Genoese had reduced, excepting Alessandria, all the Country on the other Side the Po, might pass the River, and intercept those Provisions which came to the French Camp by way of the Lomellina. But the Doge of Genoa would not consent, because he was himself in Fear of the Stratagem of Fregoso who was in Alessandria, and because the Venetians, whose Troops had pass'd the Adda, refus'd to cross the Oglio whilst that Body of French that had quitted Caravaggio continued near Monza for fear of endangering Bergamo. At Prospero's Desire, Four Hundred Light Horse and Five Hundred Foot were sent to Trezzo, in

in order to oblige the French to quit that A. D.
Neighbourhood, by cutting off their Pro- ^{1523.} visions.

WHILST both Parties were thus employed no other military Actions were performed than light Skirmishes, Plunderings and Excursions, mostly to the Disadvantage, and sometimes to the considerable Loss of the French, as for Instance, when Gio de' Medici went out to escort the Provisions which were coming from Trezzo to Milan, with Two Hundred Men at Arms, One Hundred Light Horse, and One Thousand Foot, meeting with Eighty French Men at Arms, mostly belonging to Bernabo Visconti, first seemed to pursue them, then artfully retiring drew them into an Ambush where he had placed Five Hundred Men with Fire Arms, who without much difficulty routed Giov. de' them, and killed or took the greatest Medici Part. In another Encounter likewise routs Bernabo Visconti.
Zuccherò Borgognone broke Sixty Men at Arms of the Grand Ecuyer's Regiment. The Spaniards also often attacked and destroyed a good Number of the French

A. D. French who guarded the Trenches where 1523. the Pioneers were at work in cutting Trenches under Cover of the Ramparts, and Pagolo Luzzafco who was in Pizzichitone with Fifty Horse, making Excursions all over the Country, greatly annoyed those who were in Cremona.

NEITHER had the Admiral any better Success in his secret Negotiations; He had privately agreed with one Morgante of Parma, a chief Officer of Giovanni de' Medici's Regiment, Gianni- colo de Lanzi, and Four others, being only let into the Secret, that when he should be appointed to guard the Bastion which had a Wicket beyond the Outworks, he should introduce the French.
 On the Night the Plot was to be executed, Morgante imagining he had Occasion for more Confederates, discovered it to another of his Acquaintance, who seeming to approve of the Scheme, advised him to go and in Prospero's Name order the Centinels not to stir if they should hear any Noise, that they might not be prevented from molesting the Person A. D. whom he should send to the Enemy's ^{1523.} Camp to inform them of his being in Readiness for their Reception. The Admiral had ordered One Thousand Foot that very Night to approach the Bastion, that they might be prepared to advance as soon as the Signal was given and the whole Army to be under Arms. But whilst Morgante was gone to give his Order, the other flew to Giovanni de' Medici, and discovered the whole Affair, and then seized on the Conspirators who, according to military Justice, were executed, by passing thro' the Pikes.

BUT the Affairs of the French now in all Parts, seemed to decline, for the Fertility of the Country about Milan, together with the new Mills which the Besieged had erected within, lessened every Day, their Hopes of reducing the Town by Famine, and it was computed that in the many Skirmishes in the Neighbourhood of Milan, what with killed and disabled they had lost Fifteen Hun-VOL. VIII. F dred

A. D. 1523. dred Horſe, and were become ſo fearful, that they durſt not ſtir out of their Entrenchments, unleſs when they were under a Neceſſity to ſend out Eſcorts to their Proviſions or Forage ; and then they iſſued forth in great Bodies, but the Admiral made a Merit of this Diſgrace, and was heard to ſay that he did not conduct the War like the hot-headed French Commanders, but had learned from the Italians how to act with Maturity and Moderation, yet whenever his Horſe or Foot met the Enemy they ſhewed a greater Propenſity to run away than to fight.

THE Imperial Officers being thus freed from the Fear of the Enemy, and of ſtarving, and on the contrary in Hopes of rendering difficult the Proviſions of the French, were now under no other Uneaſineſſes than that of the Want of Money, without which they could hardly provide for the Suſtenance of thoſe in Milan, and it would be almoſt impoſſible to eſcort them out of the Town, if the Occaſions of the War required required it. To obviate this Difficulty ^{A. D.} ^{1523.} amongst other Ways and Means, Prospero with the secret Consent of the Vice-king and Duke of Sessa, had soon after the Pope's Death began to treat with the Duke of Ferrara, (who had often refused the Offers made him by the Admiral for marching his Troops to assist the Siege of Cremona after he had taken Reggio) and he agreed with Prospero that as soon as he should be put in Possession of Modena through his Means, to pay him immediately Thirty Thousand Ducats, and Twenty Thousand more in Two Months. The Affair seemed easy, for as soon as Prospero should send his Orders to Count Guido Rangoni, who was in the Service of the League, and to the Spanish Foot to quit Modena, the Inhabitants thus abandoned would submit to the Duke. Prospero was induced to take this bold Resolution not only with a View to the public Good, but to gratify also his private Friendship with Alfonso d'Este, and weaken the papal grandeur, which was a common Desire of all the Roman Barons, that when Modena and

A. D. Reggio were separated from the Church 1523. the Duke of Milan might, with greater Ease, get Possession of Parma and Pia- cenza.

Discovered to Guicciar-
dini.

THIS Negotiation, tho' carried on with great Secrecy, came to the Knowledge of Count Rangoni who communicated it to Guicciardini. He saw immediately that the only Way to save the Town was to persuade the Spanish Commanders, who having been used well, and receiving a large Salary, were content with their Station, to pretend that they were not under Prospero's Authority till they had joined his Army, and therefore would not depart from Modena, till they received an express Order from the Duke of Sessa, who had sent them thither. The Governor was very sensible that this Treaty had not been carried on without the Knowledge of Sessa, yet as that Duke was the Imperial Ambassador at Rome, he thought that when the College of Cardinals made their Remonstrances he would not only be ashamed to give such Orders, but at their Requests would act quite the contrary.

THE

THE Governor's Project took Effect, A. D. 1523. and Things succeeded according to his Wishes, for Count Guido and the Spaniards on receiving Prospero's Orders to come to Milan, where their Presence was necessary, the Count gave several Reasons for not coming, as that he was neither a Subject of the Church nor a Modenese, and the Spaniards instructed by him and the Governor, made Answer, that they could not stir till they were commanded by the Duke of Sessa. After the Governor had informed the Cardinals of what had passed they sent for the Duke of Sessa to appear in the Conclave, where, not being willing to render himself, and consequently Cæsar, suspected, he would not deny but that he had sent his Orders to the Spanish Officers not to depart from Modena. This Discovery, as it often happens in human Affairs, produced Effects quite contrary to what had been imagined, for when certain Letters of Prospero, intercepted by the Governor, were produced in the College, by which the Progress of the whole Treaty was discovered, the Cardinals Adherents to France, by whose Opposition the

A. D. Continuation of the Supplies of Money 1523. which by Means of the Cardinal de' Medicis had been begun to be sent to Modena was obstructed, now being of Opinion that the Success of the Plot would have been contrary to the Interest of their King, solicited themselves to have the Money sent to that City ; as did also Cardinal Colonna, that it might be thought he preferred the Advantage of the Apostolic See to any other Interest. These Measures deferred the Execution of Alfonso d'Este's Designs, but did not prevent the Continuation of French Negotiations. They imagined it might be so managed, that the Vice-king who, with slow Marches, was coming from Naples to Milan, with Four Hundred Lances, and Two Thousand Foot, in his Passage thro' Modena, might carry off the Spaniards.

By this Time in Milan there was no Want of Food, for the Admiral fearing the Germans in Pavia might destroy his Bridge on the Tesino, over which were brought all sorts of Provisions, detached Three Thousand Foot from the Army
 at

at Monza which was the smallest Body, ^{A. D.} and sent them to guard the Bridge, then ^{1523.} reinforcing his own with another Part of that Army, he distributed the rest in Marignano and Biagrasa near the Bridge whence the Imperialists, having Possession of Monza, were plentifully supplied with all Necessaries.

THE French Army was very strongly encamped, it consisted of Eight Hundred Light Horse, Six Thousand Swiss, ^{Description of the French Army.} Two Thousand Italian Foot, and Ten Thousand between French and Gascons, and extended from the Abbey of Charavalle as far as the Road to Pavia, and from thence for the Space of a Cannon Shot towards Milan; they had at the Bridge of the Tesino One Thousand Germans, and One Thousand Italians, and the same Number at Biagrasa, where Renzo da Ceri was placed. In Novara they had Two Hundred Lances, and Two Thousand Foot between Alessandria and Lodi.

A. D.

1523.

Imperial Forces in Milan.

IN Milan there were Eight Hundred Lances, Eight Hundred Light Horse, Five Thousand Spaniards, Six Thousand Germans, and Four Thousand Italian Foot, besides the Multitude of armed Inhabitants, who in Heart and Hand were ready to encounter the French. The Marquis of Mantoua was in Pavia with Five Hundred Lances, Six Hundred Light Horse, Two Thousand Spanish Foot, and Three Thousand Italians; Vitelli at Castel Nuovo in the Tortonese with Three Thousand Foot, tho' a little after he retired to Seravalle, being apprehensive that a Body of French who were gone towards Alessandria might intercept his Return to Genoa. The Venetians had Six Hundred Men at Arms, Five Hundred Light Horse, and Five Thousand Foot, but of these last One Thousand were sent to Milan at the Request of Prospero, who prided himself on having it known that he was assisted by the Venetians, and a little after on some Suspicion of a Plot, another Body of them were sent to Cremona.

THE

A. D.

1523.

THE Admiral at last pressed by the Difficulty in procuring Provisions, the extrem Coldness of the Season, the deep Snows, and the Grumbling of the Swiss, who protested they would bear no longer so many Inconveniencies, resolved to decamp from Milan, but before he made known this Resolution, at his Request Galeazzo Visconti asked Leave to make a Visit in Milan to Madonna Cbiara, who was no less famous for her extraordinary Beauty than for having entirely captivated the Heart of Prospero Colonna. As soon as Galeazzo entered Milan he made Proposals for a Truce, which were readily hearkened to, and the next Day near the Fortifications, Alarcone, Pagolo Vettori the Florentine Commissary, and Girolamo Morone had a Meeting with Galeazzo Visconti, and the General of Normandy on the Part of the Admiral, who proposed a Suspension of Arms for all the following Month of May, and to quarter their Army in the neighbouring Towns and Villages, and would at least have consented to reduce all their Forces beyond the Tesino. But the German

French
propose a Truce.

A. D. German Officers, vexed that their Hopes of 1523. Victory should be interrupted by a Truce, refused to agree to any Terms without the Approbation of the Vice-king, wherefore the Admiral two Days after, before Break of Day ordered the Artillery to be carried to the Banks of the Tesino, which, as soon as it was light, was followed by the whole Army, but in such Order, as to appear ready to fight if they were attacked.
 When the Retreat was discovered in the Town, not only the common Soldiers, and Citizens cried out loudly to be conducted to pursue them, but also the chief Officers, and those of the greater Authority made the same Instances to Prospero Colonna, laying before him the Facility of the Victory, for they reckoned themselves not inferior to the Enemy, and thought they should fight with much more Courage; for a Retreat must of Necessity put a Damp on most of their Spirits, which indeed was confirmed by several Italians who had just then deserted from them.
 They reminded him of the infinite Glory he would acquire, and how his Name would be perpetuated to the latest Posterity if

They retreat from Milan.

if he added to the Merit of his past Victories the Glory and Triumph which he ^{A. D. 1523.} had now in his Power to gain. But it was Prospero's stated Maxim to avoid as much as possible to put himself in the Power of Fortune, wherefore, as immovable as the most solid Fabric against all the Efforts of blowing Winds, he made Answer, that it did not become a wise General to regulate his Conduct by popular Clamours, or lead out his Men against an Army whose Preservation depended on a desperate Defence, that he had already conquered and acquired sufficient Glory, by obliging the Enemy to retire without Danger; or Effusion of Blood. That Men ought to limit their Desires, for any one might discern that, following their Counsel, if they miscarried the Loss would prove without Comparison much greater than the Advantage if they came off with Success. That by conducting himself with such Principles, he had always come off with Honour in whatever he undertook. That the Reproach of Rashness is more injurious

A. D. 1523. rious to Generals, than the Glory of a Victory is advantageous, for in the first Case the Blame falls solely and intirely on the General, whereas the Praise of Victory, at least, according to the Opinion of Mankind, is communicated amongst many. That now when he was so near his End he would not follow new Counsels, and abandon those which in the whole Course of his Life had procured him Glory, Profit, and Grandeur.

Negotiation concerning the Election of a new Pope. THE French divided their Army in Two Bodies, the Admiral with the greatest Part stopped at Bragassa and ordered the Remainder to Rosa, the first Place being distant Fourteen, the other Seven Miles from Milan. But a few Days after the Admiral was removed from Milan, a new Pope was created, after the Cardinals had been Fifty Days in the Conclave, which was opened with Thirty-six Cardinals, and Three others came in after. They wasted all this Time in making divers Conventions, being divided into Parties, not only on account of their dif- different Attachments to Cæſar and the A. D. King of France, but alſo on account of ^{1523.} the Grandeur of the Cardinal de' Medici, who, tho' oppoſed by all thoſe who were in the French Intereſt, and by ſome of Cæſar's Adherents, yet had found Means to ſecure for himſelf the Votes of Sixteen Cardinals, who were determined to chuſe him, or no other without his Conſent. He had alſo the ſecret Promiſe of Five more which he procured by his own Intereſt, and was beſides particularly diſtinguiſhed by the Ambaſſador of Cæſar and all thoſe who depended on his Authority. Tho' he had almoſt the ſame Intereſt at the Death of Pope Leo, yet he now entered the Conclave with a more firm Reſolution, neither for Length of Time, or any other Accident to give up his Hopes, principally founded on the Neceſſity of a Concurrence of Two Thirds of the preſent Cardinals, in the Election of a Pontiff. Nor would he be removed from his Reſolution by the common Danger of Italy, or the State of the Church in particular. As the Progreſs of the War varied, each Party endeavoured to protract the

A. D. ^{1523.} the Election, in Hopes that whoever got the Victory would bestow Favours on his Adherents. And the Election would have been carried on to a much greater Length if all those who were averse to Cardinal de' Medici, and who were mostly the oldest of the College, had been as united in the Choice of any other as they were in opposing him, and setting aside their private Views, had been only unanimous in excluding Cardinal de' Medici. Cardinal Colonna was a Man of a hasty and very proud Temper, and Cardinal de' Medici's bitter Enemy, but being dissatisfied with the Cardinals of his Party, because he could not prevail on them to chuse Cardinal Jacovaccio a Roman of his Faction, and who had a great Dependance on him, he went of his own Accord to Cardinal de' Medici, offering him all his Interest for his Election. Medici gave him instantly a Bond under his hand by which he engaged to make him Chancellor, which Post he then occupied himself, and make him a Present of his most sumptuous Palace, built by Cardinal San Giorgio, and given him by Pope Leo. Colonna, overjoyed

overjoyed at these Concessions, brought A. D. over Cardinal Cornaro and Two more; ^{1523.} as soon as this Change was known several others, as usually happens in Conclaves, carried away by Meanness of Spirit or Ambition, strove not to be the last in offering their Service, by which means that very Night the Cardinal de' Medici was unani- ^{Cardinal} mously adored as Pontiff, and the next ^{de' Medici} Morning the 19th of November, was ^{created} elected, according to Form, with the ^{Pope.} usual solemn Scrutiny, that Day Two Years on which he had entered triumphantly into Milan. It was believed that the vast Number of Benefices and ecclesiastical Posts of which he was in Possession facilitated his Election, for when the Cardinals came into the Conclave they unanimously signed a Convention, by which all the ecclesiastical Revenues of the Person elected, should be equally divided amongst the rest of the College. He intended to retain the Name of Julius, but being told by some Cardinals that it had been observed, that those who after their Election had not changed their Names, had died ^{and takes} within the Year, he assumed the Name ^{the Name} of Clement ^{of Clement} Clement ^{VII.}

A. D. Clement VII. either because the Festival 1523. of that Saint was near, or alluding to his having after his Election forgiven and taken into Favour the Cardinal of Vol- terra with all his Adherents, notwithstanding that Adrian, when he was drawing near his End, had declared that Cardinal incapable of assisting at the Conclave, and tho' after he was admitted by the College, he had obstinately stood out to the very last against the Election of Julius.

It is certain that the new Pope was in the highest Reputation in all Parts, and the Delay made in his Election, greater than had been for a long time, seemed to be re-compensated by the vast Authority and Worth of the Person who was seated in the Chair, because he united the Sovereign Power he had in Florence, to the extensive Power of the Church, because he had for so many Years under Leo exercised in a manner the whole Power of the Pontificate ; because he was reputed to be a Person of Gravity and firm to his Resolutions, and because several Actions which proceeded from Leo, being attributed buted to him, every one pronounced him A. D. to be a Person full of Ambition, of a ^{1523.} great and turbulent Spirit, passionately desirous of Novelties, to which may be added that he was no ways addicted to Diversions, and as it was known that he had applied himself seriously to Business, every one expected very grand and extraordinary Atchievements. His Election at once restored absolute Security to the State of the Church, for the Duke of Ferrara, terrified at the Election of so resolute a Person, and giving over all Hopes of obtaining Modena by the coming of the Viceroy of Naples, and trusting still less to the French Messengers, who by Means of Teodoro Trivulzi came to make him vast Offers if he would enter into their Alliance, after leaving sufficient Garrisons in Reggio and Rubiera, returned to Ferrara. The Affairs in Romagna were also quieted, where Giovanni da Sassatella, who, in the Life of Adrian, had been driven away by the Ghibellines, since his Death, at the Head of a good Number of Guelfs, was

A. D. returned into that Country under the 1523.  Pretext of distressing the opposite Faction, but in reality by the Encouragement of the French.

Arona
 besieged

BUT as soon as the French Army was disposed between Biagrasa and Rosa, the Admiral, retaining only Four thousand Swiss, disbanded the Troops of Dauphine and the Languedoc Foot as useless, and sent the heavy Artillery on the other Side the Tesino, determining to wait in his Camp for the Supplies that were getting ready in France, not being in the least apprehensive of being forced, and having Provisions in Plenty. But not to be idle he ordered Renzo, with Seven Thousand Italians, to besiege Arona, a strong Place on the Borders of the Lago Maggiore, in the Possession of Anchise Visconti; but Prospero Colonna sent a Succour of Twelve Hundred Foot to reinforce it. The Castle of Arona commands the Town, which, on that account, is of no Use to any one without the Castle. Renzo therefore laid Siege to the Castle, but after giving several Assaults to no Purpose, for almost a Month

THE WARS IN ITALY. 99

Month together, with the Loss of many of his Men, he broke up the Siege, confirming the Opinion that had been some time since entertained of him by the Italians, that none of his Actions, since the Siege of Crema, had been answerable to his Defence of that Town.

PROSPERO was all this while drawing near his End, having been for Eight Months in a languishing Condition, not without some Suspicion of Poison, or a Love Potion. He had once been jealous of the Arrival of the Viceroy, but now finding himself unable to carry on the Business of the War, was very solicitous for his Coming. The Viceroy at last arrived, but when he approached Milan, would not for several Days enter the Town, out of Respect and Regard to the Merits and Reputation of so famous a General; but when he heard he was at the last Extremity and delirious, he would not lose the Satisfaction of having the Sight of so great a Man, and came to his Bedside a few Hours before his Death; tho' some have asserted that he did not enter Milan before he expired,

A. D.
1523:

His Character.
 pired, which was on the last Day but one of the Year. He was no doubt reputed a famous General, and his Reputation and Authority were very much increased in his latter Days. By a long Experience he made himself a perfect Master of the military Art, yet he was not quick in embracing the Opportunities which were offered him from the Disorders and Weakness of his Adversaries; but by such Proceedings he gave also little Opportunity to the Enemy for distressing him. He was naturally very slow in his Undertakings, and may deservedly be called the Cunctator *. But the World is justly indebted to Prospero for teaching how to carry on a War more effectually with Counsel than with the Sword, and the Art of defending States without running the Risque of a Battle without Necessity. In our Days the Manner of making War has undergone several Variations; for, before the Expedition of Charles VIII. into Italy, the Strength of an

Prospero's new Way of making War.

The old Way.

* This Title of Cunctator, which signifies the Delayer, was given to Fabius Maximus when he obstructed Hannibal's Progress in Italy by avoiding an Action.

an Army consisted more of Horse in heavy Armour than in Foot. The Instruments for battering Towns were extremely inconvenient for Carriage, and unhandy when put to Use: Battles were often given, yet the Slaughter was not considerable, and little Blood was spilt. When any Town was besieged, tho' never so small or weak, it would hold out for several Days against a strong Army, not so much thro' the Skill of the Besieged as from the Unskilfulness of the Besiegers, which rendered it very difficult for any Prince to get Possession of his Neighbour's State. But since the Arrival of Charles in Italy the Terror of Foreigners, the Ferocity of a differently disciplined Infantry, and above all the Execution of the Artillery, have filled the Minds of the Italians with Terror, and convinced them that there was no Hopes of defending themselves without keeping the Field; for the Men in Garrisons, quite ignorant how to defend the Towns, gave them up at the first Approach of the Enemy, and if any had the Courage to resist, in a few Days they were not able to stand the

G 3 Assault.

A. D. 1523 Affault. Thus the Kingdom of Naples, and the Dutchy of Milan were attacked and taken, as one may say, the same Day. Thus the Venetians, after the Loss of one Battle, immediately abandoned all their Terra Firma. In the same manner the French, at the very Sight of the Enemy, deserted the Dutchy of Milan. Mankind, terrified at the easy Loss of their Towns by these destructive Instruments, applied all their Wits and Art to find out Methods of Defence, and with such Success that they have fortified even their smallest Towns with Ramparts, Ditches, Flanks, Outworks, and Bastions, whence being assisted by a numerous Artillery, which does more Execution in the Defence than in the Siege of Places, the Towns are rendered secure, it being a very hard matter to take a Town fortified in such a Manner. The Recovery of Otranto from the Turks in our Forefathers Times, gave us perhaps the first Notions of such Sort of Fortifications; for Alfonso Duke of Calabria, on entering that Town, found that the Ottomans had made several Works unknown to the Italians,

Italians, but the Memory of them had A. D. been only retained, for they were never ^{1523.} put in Practice. Prospero by these Arts, much to his Honour, twice defended the Dutchy of Milan, he being the only or the chief Person who used them both defensively and offensively; for by cutting off his Enemy's Provisions, and prolonging the War, he consumed them with Weariness, Length of Time, Poverty and Disorders. In this manner he both defended himself and conquered without fighting, and even without drawing a Sword, or breaking a single Lance. His Example has been since followed, and many Wars, that had lasted for several Months, have been terminated more by Industry and good Management, and making a proper Use of all Advantages, than by Battles.

SUCH were the Transactions of the Year 1523 in Italy, and the same Year there were great Expectations from the Preparations that were making beyond the Mountains, which produced Effects not worthy of such great Princes, for

A. D. 1523. Cæsar and the King of England had agreed with the Duke of Bourbon, that they would with mighty Armies make an Irruption, one into Picardy, the other into Guyenne ; but the Motions of the King of England in Picardy were to little Purpose, and the Attempt of Bourbon in Burgundy soon came to nothing ; for not being able to pay his German Foot, some of the Officers agreed with the King of France, and withdrew Part of their Troops, and Bourbon despairing of Success in France went to Milan, where Cæsar not liking he should go to Spain, left perhaps he should perfect the Matrimony, which he did not desire should take place, sent him by Buren the Title of his Lieutenant General in Italy, desiring him to continue there. Nor did Cæsar's Affairs on the Side of Spain proceed according to his Wishes ; for tho' solicitous for the War he was arrived at Pampelona, in order to enter France in Person, and had already sent the Army beyond the Pyrenean Mountains, which had taken Sauterre, not far distant from St. Jean du Pied de Port, yet his Power not invade

Spaniards
France.

not being equal to his Eagerness, for want of Money he could not subsist ^{A. D. 1523.} such a Number of Forces as was necessary for so great an Undertaking; nor had he been able on the same account to assemble his Army, till towards the latter End of the Year; and the Coldness of the Season with the Scarcity of Provisions, that could not be easily conveyed at such a Distance, were additional Difficulties, which at last obliged him to disband this ^{Spanish} Army ^{dis-} banded. against the Advice of almost all his Council. And Federigo of Toledo, Duke of Alva, a Nobleman of great Age and Authority, did not scruple saying in the Heat of the War, that Charles in many Things resembled Ferdinando, his Grandfather by the Mother's Side, but in this Expedition he acted more like Maximilian, his Grandfather by the Father's Side.

WE are now entering on the Year 1524, in the Beginning of which Cæsar's Commanders, taking Advantage of the Distress of the French, hoped they should be able

A. D.
1524, able to put an End to the War: For this Purpose they sent for the Duke of Urbino, and Pietro da Pesaro, the Venetian Proveditor, to come to Milan, in order to consult on the future Operations: When it was unanimously resolved that as soon as the Six thousand Germans which the Viceroy had ordered to be enlisted, were arrived at Milan, the Imperial and Venetian Army should jointly approach the Enemy, and expel them from that State with Sword or Famine. As they were persuaded they had a sufficient Force to compass this Design, there remained no other Obstacle than the Difficulty of raising Money; for as the Scarcity of Money in the Imperial Army.

Soldiery were greatly in Arrears, there was no Hopes of making them march out of Milan, or the other Towns, till they were paid; nor was it less necessary, while the Army kept the Field, to make Provision for the ordinary Course of Payments. To remove these Difficulties in part, the Milaneze, being heartily tired of the War, raised Ninety Thousand Ducats amongst themselves, and lent them chearfully to the Duke

Duke, whose Punctuality had already ^{A. D.} been experienced, when he repaid them ^{1524.} out of his Treasury the Sums they had advanced when Lautrech lay before Milan. The Pope also at this Juncture gave a helping Hand; for, dreading by what had past, the Effects of a French Victory, unknown to the Messengers sent by the King of France, to whom he pretended the contrary, he very privately gave Cæsar's Ambassadors Thirty Thousand Ducats, and insisted that the Florentines, of whom the Viceroy demanded a fresh Contribution, by Virtue of the Confederacy made in Adrian's Time, should pay Thirty Thousand Ducats in full of all Demands. Not that the Pope had any Intention to shew for the future any Partiality to either of the contending Parties: On the contrary, his Impartiality was plainly seen; for when Cæsar and the King, on his Assumption to the Pontificate, sent him, one Buren, and the other San Massan, to engage him in their Interest, he hearkened to neither, but resolved, as soon as the present Disturbances were composed, to proceed with that Moderation Clement is resolved to stand neuter between the Emperor and the King of France.

A. D.

1524.

deration in Differences between Christian Princes as was proper for a Roman Pontiff, and, without shewing any particular Propensity to either, use his utmost Endeavours to dispose them to Peace. This Behaviour was at that Time agreeable to the King of France, who feared that Clement entertained the same ill Disposition towards him now he was Pope, as he had when Cardinal; Cæsar on the contrary was displeased, thinking his past Friendship, and, since Leo's Death, the Interest he had given him for his Election, ought to have induced him not to separate from him; wherefore he took it very ill when it was signified to him, on the Part of the Pontiff, that tho' he had not divested himself of the Benevolence which he had hitherto entertained for him, yet since he had now laid aside the private Person, and was become a common Father, he was in Duty bound for the future to dispense common Duties.

BUT whilst the Viceroy was getting himself in Readiness to march against the Enemy, he sent Giovanni de' Medici to besiege besiege Marignano, which together with A. D. the Castle surrendered; and a few Days ^{1524.} after the Marquis of Pescara, who, not being disposed to serve under Prospero Colonna, did not come to the Army till that General was at the last Extremity, being informed that Bayard was posted in Rebecca with Three Hundred Light Horse, and a good Body of Foot, in conjunction with Giovanni de' Medici, he Marigna- suddenly attacked them, and took most no taken. of their Men, with their Horses, and dis- Marquis persed and put to Flight the rest; then of Pescara with all Speed he retired to Milan, that he routs a might not give Time for those in Bia- grassa to pursue him. His Industry and Party at Valour were much cried up on this Rebecca.

Occasion, but much more his Speed; for Rebecca is but Two Miles distant from Biagrasa, but is Seventeen from Milan, from whence he had set out.

THE State of the War was now reduced to this Point, that the Hopes of the French consisted in their Enemy's Want of Money, and those of the Im-perialists in their Adversary's Want of Provisions,

A. D. Provisions, for they could not think of 1524. dislodging them by Force from their very strong Camp of Biagrasfa; yet both Parties expected Succours, these of Ger- man Foot, and the other of Swiss and other Foot. The Admiral set Fire to the Town of Rosa, and withdrew the Garrison to Biagrasfa, and to annoy the Enemy made Excursions all over the Country, burning and destroying every Thing before him. But the German Foot being at last arrived, the Imperial Army consisting of sixteen Hundred Men at Arms, fifteen Hundred Light Horse, seven Thousand Spani- ards, twelve Thousand Germans, and fifteen Hundred Italians, with the Duke of Milan, the Duke of Bourbon, the Viceroy and the Marquis of Pescara at their Head, after Four Thousand Foot had been left to guard Milan, went and encamped at Venasco, where a few Days after the Duke of Urbino joined them with Six Hundred Men at Arms, Six Hundred Light Horse, and Six Thousand Venetian Foot. The Castle of Cremona, in the mean Time, not being able to hold out any longer for Want of Food, and Federigo da

Imperial Army marches to Venasco.

Castle of Cremona
 surrenders.

da Bozzole having in vain attempted to relieve it, surrendered to the Imperialists. After this the Cæsarean Army marched to Casera Five Miles distant from Bia- grassa, where the Admiral, after distributing Two Hundred Lances and Five Thousand Foot between Lodi, Novara, and Alessandria, had posted himself with Eight Hundred Lances, Eight Thousand Swiss, which a few Days after were increased with Three Thousand more, Four Thousand Italian, and Two Thousand German Foot, and having as yet sufficient Quantity of Provisions in the Army and neighbouring Towns for Two Months, it was impossible to attack him in his strong Entrenchments without the utmost Hazard. Wherefore the Imperialists had very often attempted to pass the Tesino, in order to take those Towns which supplied the Enemy with Necessaries on that Side, and prevent what Succours might come from France from joining the Army, but were always fearful that such a Step might endanger Milan, till at last, considering 1524.

A. D.

Description of the French
Army.

A. D. 1524. dering the Confidence they might repose in the People of that City, they thought a very large Garrison was not necessary, and therefore came to a Resolution of passing that River, and the Duke with Giovanni de' Medici returned to Milan, where the Garrison now consisted of Six Thousand Foot. On the Second Day of March the Army passed the Tesino, near Pavia, over Three Bridges, the main Body quartered at Gambalo, and the Remainder were distributed in the neighbouring Villages. On occasion of this Passage the Admiral, to secure Vigevano, sent thither immediately Renzo da Ceri, and Five Days after fearing he should lose that Town, and the rest of the Lomellina, which if taken would leave him in a manner besieged, decamped with his whole Army, leaving One Hundred Horse and One Thousand Foot at Biagrasa. He placed his Van-guard before Vigevano, and the main Body at Mortara, Two Miles from Gambalo, where the Viceroy was posted; he was very safe in this Situation, had Plenty of Provisions, and a secure Communication with the Monferrato, Vercelli,

Vercelli, and Novara, and the Places A. D. being near many others, all Necessaries ^{1524.} passed from Town to Town with as much Ease as if they were under a Convoy.

THE Admiral for two Days successively offered Battle to the Enemy, who, tho' sensible of their superior Numbers, and Valour of their Men, refused to fight, not being willing to put to Chance their almost certain Hopes of Victory, for by some intercepted Letters they were informed the Enemy began to want Money.

AFTER the Imperial Army had passed the Tesino, the Duke of Urbino with the Venetian Troops laid Siege to Garlasco, a Town strongly situated, and well fortified with Ditches and Ramparts, and garrisoned by Four Hundred Italian Foot, which lying on the other Side of the Tesino, between Pavia and Trumello, where he had designed to encamp, intercepted the Access of Provisions, not only to him, but to all the rest of the Army. On his Arrival he raised a Bat-

Vol. VIII. H tery,

A. D. tery, and gave, the same Day, the As-1524. fault, in which being repulsed, many of his Men, and some of those of Giovanni de' Medici, passed the Ditches up to their Necks in Water, and made so vigorous an Attack, that they forced their Way into the Town with great Slaughter of the Enemy.

THE Imperial Army moved afterwards to San Giorgio near Pieve al Carro, with an Intent of laying Siege to Sartirano, situated on the Side of the Po, a strong Town which lay convenient for preventing Provisions going to the French.
 The Care of this Place was committed to Ugo Pepoli, and Giovanni Birago; it had in Garrison some Horse and Six Hundred Foot; but Giovanni d' Urbino, arriving with some Artillery and Two Thousand Spaniards, took first the Town and then the Fort, putting the common Soldiers to the Sword, and making the Officers Prisoners. The French were on their March to succour Sartirano, but were prevented by the Speed of the Enemy, and on hearing on the Road what

THE WARS IN ITALY. 115

what had happened, they stopped with A. D: 1524.
 their whole Army at Monza. Neither had the French better Success in other Parts of the Dutchy; for the Garrison of Milan forced the Town of San Giorgio, that lay beyond Monza, from whence those of Biagrasa were supplied with Provisions, to surrender. Vitelli recovered Stradella, where the Inhabitants had sent for the French quartered in Lodi, on account of the ill Usage they received from the German Garrison. Pagolo Luzzasco meeting a strong Body of French Horse put them to Flight; and Federigo da Bozzole having set out from Lodi to make an Attempt on Pizzichitone returned with Shame instead of Victory, being repulsed after many of his Men had been killed and many wounded. The only Advantage they obtained was the intercepting of Fourteen Thousand Ducats sent to the Army by Cæsar, which were seized in an Excursion between Piacenza and Tortona.

A. D.

1524.

IN the Midst of these Difficulties, two Things kept up the Admiral's Spirits, one his Hopes of a Diversion, the other of a speedy Succour, for the King had sent, by the Mountain of Monginevra, Four Hundred Lances, which were to be joined by Ten Thousand Swiss, and Renzo da Ceri was conducting Five Thousand new enlisted Grisons, by the Way of Val di Saffina into the Territory of Bergamo, whence they were to proceed to join Federigo da Bozzole who had with him a good Number of Italian Foot. The Admiral expected that the Imperialists on their Arrival would be obliged to repass the Tesino, for the Security of Milan. The Duke of Milan sent Giovanni de' Medici against those Forces, with Fifty Men at Arms, Three Hundred Light Horse, and Three Thousand Foot, who joining Three Hundred Men at Arms, Three Hundred Light Horse, and Four Thousand Foot of the Venetians, approached the Enemy who was at Cravina, a Country Seat between the Rivers Adda and Brembo, Eight

THE WARS IN ITALY. 117

Eight Miles distant from Bergamo, and A. D. with Part of his Men made Excursions 1524. to their very Camp. But the Swiss, the Third Day after their Arrival, complaining that in Cravina they had neither found Money nor Horse, nor another Body of Foot, as they had been promised by Renzo, returned into their own Country.

AFTER the Swiss had broke up, Giov. de' Medici took Caravaggio, and then passing the Adda with the Artillery destroyed the Bridge of the French at Bufaloro on the Tesino. Biagrassa was now the only Place remaining in Possession of the French between Milan and the Tesino, it was well stored with Provisions, and had a Garrison of One Thousand Foot under Girolamo Caracciolo a Neapolitan. This Town being situated on the great Canal, was of great Hindrance to the Provisions which were usually sent that Way to Milan. The Duke took with him to this Siege Giovanni de' Me- dicci, and was accompanied by all the Mi- *lane*se Youth as well as Soldiery, and H 3
having

A. D. having battered the Walls from Sunrise till Noon, the Town was taken that ^{1524.} very Day, to the great Honour of Giov. de' Medici, who on this Occasion gave Marks not only of a superior Valour, but acted with as much Prudence and Authority as could be expected from any great General. Caracciolo was taken Prisoner, many of the Garrison were killed in the Action, and Medici ordered several who had deserted from him to be hanged. As soon as the Town was taken those in the Castle capitulated, and surrendered on a Promise of Safety for their Persons. This Victory was joyful News for the Inhabitants of Milan, but their Misfortune, without Comparison, exceeded their Joy. For the Plague that had begun in Biagrasa, by means of Goods carried away in the Plunder was transported to Milan, and a pestilential Contagion being spread, it made such a Havock, that in Milan only Fifty Thousand Persons were carried off.

THE Whole of the War was now centered on the other Side the Tesino, where the Admiral after the Loss of Sartirano, on a new Approach of the Imperialists, abandoned Mortara, and in Two Marches arrived at Novara with his Army greatly diminished, for many of his Foot and of his Lances also had filed off and were returned to France, so that he had no other Measures to take than to gain Time, till he could be joined by Eight Thousand Swiss, who were arrived in the Neighbourhood of Jurea. On the other Hand the Imperialists, intent on preventing this Succour, and reducing the Enemy into Difficulties by cutting off their Provisions, possessed themselves of the Villages round Novara, putting to the Sword the French who had been left to guard them, and after placing a Garrison in Vercelli to prevent the Swiss from entering that Town, posted themselves at Biandra, a Place between Vercelli and Novara, where their Camp was surrounded by Ditches, Trees and Waters. At last the Admiral being informed that the

A. D. 1524. Swiss were moved from Jurea, and had halted at the River Slesia, which they had not been able to pass on account of the Height of the Waters, and being desirous to join them, in order, as it was thought, to make a secure Retreat, quitted Novara, and went and encamped on the same River ; where being in Want of Provisions, and his Men daily deserting, he ordered a Bridge to be laid between Romagnana and Gattinara, whilst the Enemy from Bian-dra had marched to Briona, and from thence formed their Camp within two Miles of Romagnana. The French thus strengthened passed the River the Day following, and if the Enemy had narrowly watched their Motions, it was thought they might have obtained that Day a compleat Victory. But their Generals differed in their Counsels, some being desirous to fight, others to let them depart unmolested. Nor indeed did military Affairs in the Imperial Army seem to be conducted with proper Care and Attention. The Marquis of Pescara was the sole Person who, for a constant Steadiness in all his Actions, seemed worthy of being entrusted entrusted with the supreme Power ; but A. D.

1524. the other Commanders, envious of his Merit and Glory, sought rather to obscure his Fame by despising and contradicting his Counsels, than to augment his Credit by concurring with him. It was late in the Day when the News of the Departure of the French reached the Imperial Camp ; but as soon as it was known many Light Horse, and many Foot in a disorderly manner, without Colours, waded the River, and followed them, and coming up to their Rear, began to skirmish ; the French fighting and marching forwards sustained them for a long Time, yet at last they left behind Seven Pieces of Artillery and a very great Quantity of Ammunition and Provisions, besides Part of the Baggage of the Horse and Foot, and had many of their Men killed in fighting. They made a Feint as if they intended to lodge at Gattinara, a Mile distant from Romagnana, and at the same Time secretly sent forward their Baggage and Artillery. But as soon as the Enemy, imagining they had taken up their Quarters at Gattinara, had begun to retire, they mar-

A. D. 1524. marched on Six Miles farther to Ravifingo which lies towards Jurea. The Imperialists lodged quietly the same Night on the River, but passed it as soon as the Moon began to shine, though not followed by the Venetians, who being entered into the Territory of the Duke of Savoy, thought they had already exceeded the Obligation of their Confederacy, by which they were only engaged to defend the Dutchy of Milan. The French proceeded with a slow March, and in very good Order, and having placed the Swiss in the Rear, they repulsed the first Horse and Foot that overtook and attacked them in a disorderly manner Two Miles beyond Ravifingo. On the Arrival of the Marquis of Pescara the Fight was renewed, but not in such a Manner as to stop the March of the French, who in this last Skirmish lost Giovanni Gabaneo, and Monf. de Bayard, who having received a Musquet Shot was made Prisoner, and died soon after of his Wound. The Marquis, tho' by this time he had been joined by a good Number of his Men, did not think it proper to continue the Pursuit without
the

the Assistance of the whole Army and A. D. the Artillery; and thus both French and ^{1524.} Swiss without farther Molestation returned to their own Habitations, after leaving at Bauri, beyond Jurea, Fifteen Pieces of Artillery to the Care of Three Hundred Swiss, and one of the Lords of that Country; but this did not secure them, for the Imperial Generals on Notice given sent and seized them: The conquering Army was afterwards divided into several Bodies. The Duke of Urbino was ordered to Lodi, the Marquis of Pescara to Alessandria; those two Cities only remaining in Possession of the French, for Novara, on the Approach of the Duke of Milan and Giovanni de' Medici, had surrendered.
The Viceroy undertook to march against Rotellino, who with Four Hundred Lances had passed the Mountains; but he, on hearing of the Admiral's Retreat, returned immediately into France. Nor did Boissi and Giulio da Sanseverino, to whose Care the Defence of Alessandria was committed, make any Resistance: And Federigo, after obtaining a few Days time to certify himself of the Admiral's Departure, gave up

A. D. up Lodi, on Condition of having Liberty 1524. to transport his Italian Foot into France, as had been permitted to those in Alessandria, and these Troops, which in both Cities amounted to about Five Thousand Men, were afterwards of signal Service to the King of France.

THUS ended the War against the Dutchy of Milan, under the Direction of the Admiral; by which the Power of the King of France receiving no Diminution, and the Roots of Evils not being extirpated, but only covered, new Calamities were expected to arise; for tho' Italy was freed from its present Disasters, it was not free from Jealousies of their being renewed. Cæsar however, at the Persuasion of the Duke of Bourbon, and invited by the Hopes that his Authority would be of very great Moment, attempted to transfer the Seat of the War into France, in concert with the King of England.

IN

IN the Beginning of this year he laid Siege to Fonterabia, a very small Town on the Frontiers of Spain and France; and tho' it was plentifully provided with military Stores, Victuals and Men, who had sufficient Notice to repair the old and raise new Fortifications, yet for want of Experience they made them with so little Skill, that finding themselves exposed to the Fire of the Enemy, they were soon obliged to capitulate, and surrendered on Condition of Safety for their Persons.

AFTER the Recovery of Fonterabia, The Pope Cæsar formed greater Projects, and there-^{follicits a Peace.} fore paid little regard to the Persuasions and Authority of the Pope, who in the Beginning of this Year had sent to him and to the Kings of England and France, to solicit them to enter into a Treaty of Peace, or at least agree to a Suspension of Arms, but with little Hopes of Success. The King of France, not expecting to obtain a Peace answerable to his Wishes, was desirous of a Two Years Truce; whilst Cæsar,

A. D. Cæsar, despising a Truce, which would 1524. only give Time to the King to be better prepared for a new War, wanted Peace, and any Sort of Convention made by the Pope was disagreeable to the King of England, from a Desire he had entertained of being constituted the sole Mediator, to which he was persuaded by the ambitious counsels of the Cardinal of York. This Man, tho' of a very low Extraction and despicable Blood, found means to gain such an Ascendant over that Prince, as to make it evidently appear to every one that the King's Orders, without his Approbation, were of no Significancy; and on the contrary, whatever Orders he issued, even without the King's Knowledge, were punctually executed. But the King and the Cardinal at this Juncture dissembled with Cæsar, and seemed ardently desirous of making War against France, to which Kingdom Henry pretended for various Reasons, to have a Right, grounding his first Claim from the time of Edward III. King of England. This Edward, after the Death of Charles IV. King of France, surnamed the

Cardinal
Wolsey.

Pretensions of the English Sovereigns to the Kingdom
 of France.

the Fair, who in 1328 died without A. D. Issue Male, being born of a Sister of Charles, made Instances to be declared King of France, as the nearest Male a-kin to the deceased King. But he was excluded in a general Parliament of France, which decreed that, according to the Salic Law, which was a very antient Law of that Kingdom, not only Females but all Descendants of the female Line were excluded from the Succession. But Edward, soon after taking upon him the Title of King of France, entered that Kingdom with a powerful Army, and obtained several Victories both over Philip de Valois, who by general Consent had been declared Successor to Charles the Fair, and over John his Son, whom he took in a Battle, and carried Prisoner into England. After some Time he made a Peace with John, who yielding to him several Provinces and States in the Kingdom of France, Edward renounced the Royal Title of that Kingdom. But the Articles of this Peace not being long complied with, several Wars and lasting Truces ensued, till Henry V. of England, entering

A. D. ¹⁵²⁴ ing into an Alliance with Philip Duke of Burgundy, who was fallen out with the Crown of France on account of the Murder of his Father Duke John, was so successful against Charles the VI. a Lunatic, that he made himself Master of almost the whole Kingdom, with Paris its Capital, where meeting with the King and Queen, he married their Daughter Catherine, prevailing on the distracted Sovereign to agree that, notwithstanding his Son Charles was living, the Kingdom after his own Death should be transferred to Catherine and her Children. By Virtue of this invalid and unreasonable Title, after Henry's Death, his Son Henry VI. was solemnly crowned King of France and England in Paris. But Charles, after his Father's Death called Charles VII. taking Advantage of the bloody Wars which were afterwards kindled in England amongst the Princes of the Royal Blood; expelled the English out of all their Conquests in France, excepting Calais, and sent them on the other Side of the Ocean : Yet the Kings of England have continued to retain the Title of King of France. These Reasons were sufficient to excite Henry VIII. to a War, who was more secure than any other of his Predecessors in his Kingdom. For the Kings of the House of York, which gave Name to one of the Factions, having depressed those of the House of Lancaster, the Name of the other, the Lancastrians, after the Extinction of the Male Issue of that Family, exalted to the Throne Henry of Richmond, as the nearest in Blood of that Race, who after the Death and Overthrow of the Kings his Adversaries, that he might reign with the greater Security and Authority, married a Daughter of Edward the last King but one of the House of York *. Wherefore it appeared that on Henry born of that Matrimony were transferred all the Rights of both Families, who bore for their Ensigns the Red and White Rose. Henry however was not so much induced to take up Arms in hopes of conquering the Kingdom of France, which he knew
of

VOL. VIII. I would

A. D.

1524.

* The Author, by calling Edward the last King but one of the York Line, seems to have overlooked Edward V.

^{1524.} A. D. would be attended with innumerable Difficulties, as by the Cardinal of York's Sollicitations, who, foreseeing the many Troubles and Inconveniencies which must necessarily arise in the Course of a War, ambitiously coveted and expected that the King his Master would be constituted Umpire of all Differences. And, as he knew his Authority in settling the Articles of Peace would have the greatest Weight, he pleased himself with the Thoughts of making his Name glorious throughout the Universe, and intended at the same time to establish his Interest with the King of France, to whom he had secretly inclined : And this was the true Reason why his Engagements at this Juncture were not so strong as they ought to have been, had he really intended to come heartily into a War. But these were sufficient to confirm Cæsar in his Resolution to take up Arms, and a still greater Inducement were the Hopes he had placed on the vast Interest and Authority of the Duke of Bourbon in the Kingdom of France, which he expected would raise considerable derable Commotions in that Country: A. D. 1524: Wherefore, tho' many, laying before him the Want of Money, and the uncertain Faith of his Allies, counselled him to shake off all Thoughts of a War attended with so many Difficulties, and to consent that the Pope might treat for a Suspension of Arms, he entered into a Confederacy with the King of England, and the Duke of Bourbon, on these Conditions: That the Duke should march out of Italy into France with Part of the Army which was in Italy: As soon as he had passed the Alps, the King of England should pay him One Hundred thousand Ducats towards the first Month's Expences of the War, and should be afterwards at Liberty either to continue his monthly Contributions, or to pass with a powerful Army into France, and open the Campaign the first Day of July, and continue his Operations till the End of December, in which Case the States of Flanders should supply him with Three Thousand Horse, One Thousand Foot, and a sufficient Train of Artillery and Ammunition: That if they

I 2

proved

A. D.

1524.

proved successful the Duke of Bourbon should be restored to his Estate, which had been seized by the King, and put in Possession of Provence, which he claimed by Virtue of a Cession made by the Duke of Lorrain, after the Death of Charles VIII. to Anne Dutches of Bourbon; and it was to be created into a Kingdom in his Favour: That the Duke should acknowledge Henry for King of France, and pay him Homage, the Treaty otherwise to be void and null: That Bourbon should not enter into any Negotiation with the King of France without the Consent of both Parties. That Cæsar should at the same Time attack France from the Frontiers of Spain: That the Ambassadors of Charles and Henry should use their best Endeavours to induce the Italian Powers to contribute Money towards an Expedition which would secure them for ever from a French War. But in this Point they failed of Success; for the Pope not only refused to make any Contribution, but expressly condemned the whole Undertaking, foretelling Cæsar that he would not only

THE WARS IN ITALY. 133

only be disappointed in all his Expectations in France, but also be the Cause of bringing a new War into Italy, much more dangerous than the first.

IN Pursuance of this Scheme the War was resolved on, notwithstanding the Duke of Bourbon absolutely refused to acknowledge the King of England for King of France. The Duke proposed going directly to Lyons, which was near his patrimonial Estate; but it was thought more proper to march into Provence, from whence he might with greater Conveniency be supplied from Spain, and be benefited by the Fleet which Cæsar was fitting out at his own Charge at Genoa.

THE Circumstances attending this Expedition were, that Bourbon, accompanied by the Marquis of Pescara, who, disdaining to serve under the Duke, got himself declared the Emperor's Lieutenant General, came to Nice, but with a much less Force than was intended. They had five Hundred Men at Arms, Eight Hundred

A. D.
 1524. Light Horse, Four Thousand Spanish Foot, Three Thousand Italians, and Five Thousand Germans; but the Three Hundred Men at Arms, and Five Thousand more Germans designed for this Expedition, for Want of Money, were not raised; and the Viceroy, unable to enlist a fresh Body of Foot, as had been resolved in the first Council, in order to oppose Michel' Agnolo, Marquis of Saluzzo, who was marched out of his own State, and posted on the Mountains with One Thousand Men, was obliged to keep with him his Men at Arms for the Defence of the Country. To this must be added that Cæsar's Fleet, one of the chief Hopes on which the Undertaking depended, through the Negligence or Treachery of the Commander Don Ugodi Moncada, a Pupil of Valentino, and a Man of no Morals or Principles, was found to be much inferior to the French Fleet, which had sailed from Marseilles, and was come to an Anchor in the Port of Villa Franca.

THE Imperialists however entered Provence, where Palisse, la Foellette, Renzo da Ceri, and Federigo da Bozzole, the King's Generals, Generals, not having a sufficient Force A. D. to oppose them, had distributed them- ¹⁵²⁴ selves in the Towns. Part of the Im-perialists marched along the Coast, and, after taking the Tower which commands the Port of Toulon, joined the Army with Two Pieces of Cannon:

Aix, the Capital of Provence, both for Aix sur- her Dignity and for being the Seat of ^{renders.} the Parliament, surrendered, as did also several other Towns of that Country.
 After the taking of Aix, Bourbon advised to pass the Rhone, and, removing farther from the Sea, endeavour to enter into the Heart of France, before the Country was better provided for their Reception: For the Lances, who had suffered greatly in Italy, and were now but indifferently paid, the Royal Treasure being exhausted, little expecting that their Enemies would follow them out of Lombardy into France, were in such Disorder that they could not easily be re-established; and the King distrusting, as usual, the Valour of his French Infantry, could not take the Field before the Arrival of the Swiss and Germans; and

A. D. Bourbon in the mean time was in hopes 1524. that by passing the Rhone he might make some important Progress. But the Marquiss of Pescara and the rest of the Spanish Commanders would not agree to such a Proposal ; they were for getting Possession of Marseilles, which they knew was Cæsar's Intention, because lying on the Sea, the Fleets from Spain might conveniently from thence annoy the French Coast, and the Troops make their Passage that Way into Italy. As Bourbon could not contradict them, Siege Marseilles was laid to Marseilles. Renzo da Ceri besieged. had entered that Town with the Italian Forces he had brought with him from Lodi and Alessandria, and the Besiegers were Forty Days before the Place to little Purpose ; for tho' they battered the Walls in several Places, and attempted to make Mines, yet they found too many Difficulties to struggle with, such as the Thickness of the Walls of an ancient Structure, the Valour of the Besieged, and the natural Inclination of the Inhabitants, as much devoted to the French as bitter Enemies to the Spaniards, ever since since old Alfonso King of Aragon, in his A. D.

Return from Naples to Spain, by Sur-^{1524.} prise put their Town to the Sack ; and they were now in high Spirits on account of the Succours they expected not only by Sea but also by Land. For the King was come to Avignon, a Town on the Rhone, belonging to the Church, intent on assembling a powerful Army.
To these Difficulties must be added the Want of Money in the Army ; they had lost besides all Hopes that the King, by being attacked in other Parts of his Kingdom, would be disabled from moving his whole Force to one single Part : For tho' the King of England had sent Richard Pacey to Bourbon, yet he refused the second Monthly Payment of the Hundred Thousand Ducats, and gave no Marks of any Design of invading Picardy ; on the contrary he admitted Giovanni Giovacchino, of Spetie, who was sent to him by the King of France ; and the Cardinal of York giving at the same Time cross Answers to the Imperial Ministers, Cæsar began to entertain no small Jealousy of the King's Intentions.

Neither

A. D. Neither from the Side of Spain did the 1524. Succours answer Cæsar's Desires, for the CORTES of Castile, the Name given to the Assembly of the Deputies of the whole Kingdom, had refused to grant him the Supply of Four Hundred Thousand Ducats, with which they were used to supply their Kings on Occasions of Importance, which prevented his sending Money to the Army in Provence ; and his Preparations for attacking France from his Frontiers were weak and insignificant. All these Accidents so disheartened the Besiegers, that despairing of obtaining Marseilles, and fearing great Danger from the King's Approach, they broke up the Siege the same Day that the King, after assembling Six Thousand Swiss, was setting out from Avignon with his Army. As soon as the Siege was raised, the Imperialists turned their Faces towards Italy, marching with all the Speed imaginable, as sensible of the Risque they should run if overtaken by the Whole or any Part of the King's Army in an Enemy's Country, Siege of Marseilles raised.

FRANCIS

FRANCIS now thought he had a very fair Opportunity for recovering the Duchy of Milan, both in regard to his own powerful Army, and the weak Condition of the Enemy, and because he hoped that, by taking the direct Road, he might get into Italy sooner than those who were marching from Marseilles. Being therefore determined not to let slip the Occasion which Fortune had thrown in his Way, he thus addressed his Army: “ I am determined without Delay to go in Person into Italy, and shall therefore not only not hearken to, but also take it very ill of any one who should presume to advise the contrary. Let every one punctually obey the Orders which shall be given, and attend to perform the Duties of his Office. God the Lover of Justice, in order to chastise the Insolence and Rashness of my Enemies, has at last opened a Way for my recovering what had been unjustly ravished from me.” His Constancy in this Resolution, and his Speed in its Execution kept equal Pace with his Words; for he immediately moved with his Army consisting of

A. D. Two Thousand Lances, and Twenty 1524. Thousand Foot, avoiding a Meeting with his Mother, who was coming from Avignon, to persuade him not to pass the Mountains, but to leave the Management of the War to his Generals. He ordered Renzo da Ceri to embark on the Fleet with his Troops that were in Marseilles, then to put a Stop to all Treaties, or distrusting the Pope, he forbade the Archbishop of Capoua, who was sent Ambassador to him, and was afterwards to pass to Cæsar, to proceed any farther ; signifying to him that he might reside at Avignon with his Mother, and execute his Commission by Letters, or else return to the Pope. He was in the mean while with all Speed following the Enemy, who, despising the Molestations given them by the Country People, and proceeding in very good Order along the Sea Shore, were arrived at Monaco, where bursting their Cannon, and loading the Mules with the Pieces for the more easy Conveyance, they advanced to Finale, at which Place, hearing of the King's Motions, they redoubled their Speed to arrive in Time for the Defence of the Duchy of Milan, for

THE WARS IN ITALY.

141 for the Troops they had left were not sufficient to make a resistance.

A. D.

1524.

BOTH Armies proceeding in this Manner towards Italy, it happened that the same Day the King came to Vercelli, the Marquis of Pescara, with the Horse and Spanish Foot, entered Alba, the Duke of Bourbon with the German Foot being a Day's March behind; the Duke, hardly allowing himself Time to breathe, the Day following from Alba arrived at Vogbiera, which was a March of Forty Miles, in order to enter Pavia the next Day. He there joined the Viceroy, who with great Speed was come from Alessandria, where he had left Two Thousand Foot in Garrison, just at the time that the King's Army began to arrive on the Banks of the Tesino. At a Council at Pavia, at which Girolamo Morone assisted, it was at first resolved to leave a sufficient Garrison in Pavia, and then to make a Stand, as had been practised before, at Milan; and Morone was ordered thither to provide all Necessaries, and the Duke, who had been sent for to come to Pavia, was to follow him.

A. D. him, Antonio de Leva being left in Pavia 1524. with Three Hundred Men at Arms, and Five Thousand Foot, all Germans, excepting a few Italians. They accordingly set out for Milan; but that Town, having Plague in been all the Summer sorely afflicted with Milan. the Plague, had no Resemblance of its former Lustre; for vast Numbers of the Citizens having perished, and of those who had escaped so dire a Calamity many being gone away, there was no more to be seen that Plenty of Provisions, and it was very difficult to raise Money; and as no Care had been taken to keep up the Fortifications, they lay in Ruins; yet, in the Midst of all these Misfortunes, the People were as ready as before to undergo the same Labour and Danger. But Morone, being convinced that to bring the Army to Milan would rather prove the Destruction of the Soldiery than the Defence of the City, took another Resolution, and, in the Midst of a Multitude of Citizens, made the following Speech:

WE

“ WE may repeat this Day, with no less ^{1524.} Anguish of Mind, the same Words that ^{Morone's} were pronounced by our Saviour in his ^{Speech to} Agony, ‘ The Spirit indeed is ready, but the ^{the Mila-} Flesh is weak.’ You are in the same Disposition as ever to live under the Government of your Duke Francesco Sforza, and his Heart is equally oppressed for the Miseries and Dangers of his beloved People ; he is willing and ready to lay down his Life for your Safety, and you are as much desirous to expose your Persons for his Support as you have done on former Occasions. But your Strength is no ways equal to your good Will, for the City is almost void of Inhabitants, we are straitened for Provisions and Want of Money, and your Fortifications are in so bad a Condition, that it is impossible to prevent the Enemy's Entrance. It is Death to the Duke to be obliged to desert you, but it would be worse than Death, if, undertaking your Defence, he should prove the Cause of your utter Destruction, which would infallibly be the Event. In such dangerous Cases that Person is reckoned prudent, who

A. D. who chuses the lesser Evil, and does not at 1524. once with one desperate Resolution deprive himself of all Hope. It is on this Principle that the Duke advises you to submit to the present Necessity, and obey the King of France, till the Return of better Times, which we have very good Reason to expect very soon. The Duke at present will take Care of himself, but afterwards your Concerns will be his chief Attention. Cæsar's Power is very great, his good Fortune not to be described, the Cause is very just, our Enemies the same we have so often conquered. God will be pleased with your Loyalty to the Duke, and with the Duke's Attention to his Country, and we ought to assure ourselves, that it is for some good End to permit us at this Instant to labour under such Calamities, and be confident that very soon he will assist us in obtaining so compleat a victory over our proud Enemies, as will enable us to retrieve all our Losses during the long Peace it will procure us." As soon as he had finished this Speech, after furnishing the Castle with Provisions, he quitted the Town.

THE

THE Duke, ignorant of what had passed, was coming towards Milan, and had no sooner got out of Pavia than he met Ferrando Castriotta with the Artillery, who informed him that part of the Enemy had passed the Tesino, and that meeting with Zuccherò Borgognone on that River, with his Light Horse, they had put him to Flight; the Duke, fearing therefore he should fall in with the French on the Road, returned to Pavia.

THOUGH the Duke and Morone had acted with Sincerity in this Affair, yet the Imperial Commanders, who were with the Army at Binasco, suspected that they had made some private Agreement with the King of France, and therefore sent Alarcone with Two Hundred Lances to Milan, whom they designed to follow, or not, according to the Advices he should give them. On his Arrival the Milanese, who were already treating with some Exiles sent thither by the King, taking Courage, cried Cæsar and Francesco Sforza! But Alarcone finding it was not practica-

A. D. 1524. ble to defend the Town, and having Notice that the Van of the French was approaching, quitted the Place and thro' the Roman Gate made towards Lodi, whither the whole Imperial Army was marching at the same Time that the Enemy were entering Milan thro' the Gates of the Tesino and of Vercelli: And if, instead of making for that City, they had followed and attacked the Imperialists, who were tired with their long Marches, and had lost a great Number of Arms and Horses, it is the general Belief that they might have dispersed them with Ease; nay, if, even after approaching Milan, they had immediately turned towards Lodi, the Imperial Commanders would not have ventured to continue there; and perhaps if they had then crossed the Adda with the same Speed, they might in all Likelihood, with the same Ease, have put the Remainder of the Army into great Confusion.

The French
enter Mi- lan.

BUT the King, either that he thought it to be a Matter of the highest Concern to make himself sure of Milan, from whence whence he always received the principal ^{A. D} Opposition, or that he was not aware of ^{1524.} the Opportunity, or from some other ^{The King orders the} Reason, not only approached Milan, ^{Castle of} which he neither entered himself, nor ^{Milan to} permitted his Army to enter, but halted ^{be besieged.} there till he had put therein a proper Garrison, and given orders for the Siege of the Castle, which was defended by 700 Spaniards. It must however be said to his great Praise, that out of his great Goodness and merciful Temper, he gave Orders that none of the Milanese should be molested. After settling what he ^{And} thought requisite at Milan, he marched ^{marches} to Pavia:² his Army to Pavia, thinking it was dangerous to leave behind a Town full of Soldiers. The King's Army was at this Time, reckoning those left in Milan, computed to consist of Two Thousand Lances, Eight Thousand Germans, Six Thousand Swiss, Six Thousand Volunteers, and Four Thousand Italians, which last grew afterwards considerably more numerous.

A. D.

1524.

Marquis
of Pescara
at Lodi.

THE Marquis of Pescara was at this Time at Lodi with Two Thousand Foot, and the Viceroy, after leaving Garrisons in Alessandria, Como and Trezzo, was gone to Scnzino, with Francesco Sforza, and Charles de Bourbon. It was joyful News to the Imperialists, amidst so many Difficulties, to hear the King was gone to Pavia. This raised their drooping Spirits, and giving them Hopes of being able to put themselves in a better Condition, provided that Town held out for some Time, without which they had no Prospect of retrieving their Affairs, they instantly sent into Germany to enlist Six Thousand Foot, having in their Hands for their Salary, and other necessary Charges, Fifty Thousand Ducats, which Cæsar had lodged in Genoa for the Use of the War in Provence. Yet nothing so much embarrassed their Counsels as the Want of Money, nor could they hope to raise any in the Dutchy, nor expected from Charles, in his penurious Condition, any thing more than his Orders to mortgage, as far as he could, the Revenues of the Kingdom of Naples.

Little

Little or no Supply either of Men or Money was expected from their old Allies, for both the Pope and Florentines, being desired to contribute Money, had given general Answers. The Pope, after the Departure of the Admiral, being fully determined to stand neuter in the War between Cæsar and the King of France, would not renew the Alliance made by his Predecessor, nor enter into any new Confederacy with any Prince: and at the very Time that he made Profession of Friendship to Charles and the King of England, he had secretly assured the King of France that he should not oppose him whenever he attacked the Dutchy of Milan: And the Venetians being required by the Viceroy to send to the Army the Troops they had engaged for in the Articles of the League, tho' they did not absolutely refuse, yet gave very cool Answers, with an Intention to regulate their Counsels according to the Turn of Affairs, either because some of them called to Mind their antient Confederacy with France, or because they believed that the King of France being in

A. D.

1524.

Venetians
do not care to join the Imperialists.

A. D.

1524.

Italy with so powerful an Army, and his Enemy in so weak a Condition, he must of course be victorious; or that they more than ever suspected the ambitious Views of Cæsar. For to the Surprise, and with the Complaints, in a manner, of all Italy, he had not yet given to Francesco Sforza the Investiture of the Dutchy of Milan. They were besides held in Suspence by the Pope's Authority, whose Counsels and Example had a great Weight with them at this Juncture.

Pavia
besieged.

BUT the King of France, having made his Approach to Pavia, on the upper Side, between the Tesino and the High Road that leads to Milan, and posted the Vanguard in the Suburb of Sant' Antonio, on the other Side of the Tesino, on the Road to Genoa, took up his own Quarters in the Abbey of San Lanfranco, a Mile from the Walls of the Town. After two Days firing from two Batteries, with his Army in Battle Array he began the Assault; but observing that the Town was well fortified within the Walls, that the Enemy made a gallant Defence, and on the

the contrary that his own Men gave manifest Tokens of Fear, after many of them had been killed, he ordered to sound the Retreat; and finding how difficult it would prove to take a Town defended by so numerous and warlike a Garrison by Storm, he determined to make a regular Siege, by cutting of Trenches, and erecting Platforms, with a vast Number of Pioneers employed in working on the Flanks, that the Soldiers might with less Danger make their Approaches. To this tedious and difficult Work he added that of making Mines being determined to gain his point tho' he should advance but Inch by Inch; and at last, under great Doubts from the Bravery and Numbers of the Besieged, and taking Advice of many able Engineers, perfectly acquainted with the Course of the River, which two Miles above Pavia divides itself into two Branches, and then a Mile below it, before entering the Po, unites again, he resolved to turn that Branch which passes by the Side of Pavia into the other lesser Branch, called Gravellone, in hopes it would facilitate the taking

A. D. of it on that Side, where the Wall, on ac-1524. count of the Security it received from the Depth of the Water, had no Fortification.
In this Work, which was carried on with an incredible Number of Hands, at a vast Expence, and not without Apprehension of frequent Sallies from the Besieged, he wasted many Days, sometimes the Violence of the Waters, very much swelled by heavy Rains, ruining the Banks, which were cast up in the Channel where the River divides itself, in order to force it into the lesser Stream, and sometimes he expected to overcome the violence of the River by Dint of Men and Money; but at last Experience convinced him of what is most commonly the Case that the Rapidity of Rivers has greater Power than all the Labour of Workmen, and the Industry of expert Engineers. The King therefore deprived of this Hope, and of taking the Town by Force, or by Arts of Engineers, was obliged to content himself with carrying on a formal Siege, by the Length of which he imagined to reduce the Garrison to a Necessity of surrendering.

BUT

A. D.

1524.

BUT whilst Affairs were proceeding in the manner related, the Pope as soon as he heard that the King had got Possession of Milan, much concerned at so prosperous a Beginning, and therefore desirous to secure his own Affairs, sent to him Gian Matteo Giberto, Bishop of Verona, his Datary, a Person he could intirely confide in, and who he knew was not unacceptable to the King. He was commissioned to call first at Sonzino, to exhort the Viceroy and other Commanders to enter into some Terms of Agreement, and acquaint them that he was proceeding on the same Errand to the French Camp: But the Imperial Generals, grown sanguine at the stout Resistance made at Pavia, fiercely answered that they would give Ear to no Composition which should leave the King of France in Possession of a Foot of Land in the Milanesè. He found no better, and perhaps a harder disposition in the King of France, who, elated with the Power of his Army, and by his being in a Condition not only to subsist but also increase

The Pope
sends the Bishop of Verona to the King.

who refuses to comply with his Desire.

A. D. 1524. crease it, answered the Bishop that it was chiefly on those Grounds he had undertaken to pass into Italy, and not, as it might be thought, with a View only of getting thither before the Enemy, tho' in this he had in a great measure succeeded : And now he made no Doubt of taking Pavia, the Walls of which he was briskly battering, having made such Works as he hoped could not be resisted by the Enemy for their Want of Powder, which was comprehended by their slow Firing ; they had also a Scarcity of Bread, and he did not despair of turning the Tesino : That he was far even from thinking that the sole Recovery of Milan and Genoa were sufficient Rewards for his great Trouble, and immense Expences, and therefore had as much in View the attacking the Kingdom of Naples. The Bishop then entered on the chief Business for which he had been sent, which was soon brought to a Conclusion ; for the Pope engaged that neither he nor the Florentines should give any Assistance either open or secret against the King, who took both the Pope and Florentines into his his Protection by a Deed, in which he A. D. particularly inserted the Authority of the ^{1524.} Family de' Medici in Florence, and it was agreed that this Convention should not be divulged till his Holiness thought proper. But tho' this Agreement came not to the Knowledge of the Imperialists, yet their Jealousy of the Pope's Intentions increased : And in order to make a full Discovery of his Mind, they sent to him Marino, Abbot of Nagera, who was Commissary of their Camp, with Proposals that might work both upon his Hopes and Fears : for on one Hand they made him vast Offers, and on the other they represented that, as Cæsar and the King of France were in the Height of their Contention, Cæsar could not but regard as Enemies whoever at this Juncture should stand neuter. But Clement replied, that nothing could be more unbecoming a Roman Pontiff than to make himself a Party in Quarrels amongst Christian Princes : The Office of a Pastor was to be neuter, by which Means he should with greater Authority become a Mediator between them, for which

A. D. which End he was already treating with ¹⁵²⁴ Cæsar by means of the Archbishop of Capua, who after the Acquisition of Mi- lan, with a Pass from the King's Mother, passed thro' Lions into Spain, where after excusing, with the same Reasons, the Pope's Refusal to renew the League which Cæsar had vehemently pressed as soon as he heard of the King's March towards Italy, he earnestly exhorted him that either with a Truce or Peace he would lay down his Arms. Cæsar surrounded by so many Difficulties was willing to come into an Agreement, for he considered that he could not raise Money in Spain for the Italian Affairs, that the King of France seemed to carry all before him, and he suspected that the King of England had made some secret Agreement with his Enemy, because that King not only refused to let the Fifty Thousand Ducats which he had remitted to Rome, for the War in Provence, be sent to the Army in Lombardy, but, what gave a greater Suspicion, demanded of Cæsar, in a Time of so great Distress, a Restitution of Money lent, and Payment of all the Sums

Cæsar
 suspects
 the King of England's Sincerity.

Sums for which he was engaged. For A. D.
Cæsar, so long ago as when he went ^{1524.} into Spain, being very desirous of an Alliance with the King of England, in order to remove any Obstacle that might keep him in Suspense, engaged to pay him the same yearly Pension which was allowed him by the King of France, and Twenty Thousand Ducats more for the Pensions Francis paid to the Cardinal of York and other English Ministers, and also the Thirty Thousand Ducats which were allotted to Queen Blanche, who had been married to King Lewis, of all which Sums nothing had hitherto been paid. To all these inward Afflictions must be added, that Cæsar, at that Time, laboured under a bodily Infirmary, for he took so much to Heart the Miscarriage at Marseilles, that it threw him into a Quartan Ague ; yet, either because he was of so high a Spirit, that no Difficulties could prevail on him to stoop to an Enemy, or confiding in the Valour of his Officers in case of a Battle, or promising himself that he must needs be an extraordinary

A. D. 1524. extraordinary Favourite of Fortune for the future as well as in Times past, he answered that it was below his Dignity to come into any Convention whilst the King of France molested with his Army the Milanese.

THE King, in the mean Time, was come to a Resolution of invading the Kingdom of Naples, in hopes that the Viceroy, alarmed at the Danger, for no Garrisons had been kept in the Towns, would either draw off his Forces from that Dutchy to defend that Kingdom, or would at least agree to lay down his Arms on disadvantageous Conditions, which was what he began almost to wish when he found so many Difficulties in the Siege of Pavia.

Duke of Albany sent for the Kingdom of Naples. HE appointed John Stuart, Duke of Albany, of the Blood Royal of Scotland, for his Commander in Chief in this Expedition, with a Detachment from the Army of Two Hundred Lances, Six Hundred Light Horse, and Four Thousand Foot, one Half of which were Italians, Italians, Four Hundred Swiss, and the rest Germans ; and ordered Renzo da Ceri, in order to join him, to land at Livorno the Foot destined for the Fleet, which, being retarded by the Difficulty in providing Neecessaries for its Equipment, was still at Anchor in the Port of Villa Franca ; and that Renzo and others of the Orfini should enlist Four Thousand Men in the Territory of Rome. He notified this Resolution to the Pontiff by Alberto Count of Carpi, his Ambassador, soliciting Leave to levy Men in Rome, and for his Army to pass thro' the Ecclesiastic State.

A. D.

1524.

THE Pope was very uneasy at such a Request, and could not bear to think that the King of France should make himself Master both of the Dutchy of Milan and of the Kingdom of Naples ; but not daring to give a flat Denial, he exhorted him to lay aside this Undertaking for the present, that he might not put him under a Necessity of refusing him what he could not consent to for just Causes, demonstrating to him, with solid Reasonings, that this Point

A. D. Point was contrary to his own Interest ; {^{1524.} for if the Desire of recovering the Dutchy of Milan had stirred him up so many Enemies, what could he expect if he was also to aspire to the Kingdom of Naples ? * Who would wonder if the Venetians should, at such a Provocation, join the Emperor, even with a greater Force than they were engaged to by Treaty ? He begged of him to consider that if by any Accident his Progress should be obstructed in Lombardy, with what Discredit he would enter Naples, and how his Miscarriage in any one of these States would inevitably be the Cause of his Overthrow in the other.
 And, lastly, that he ought to remember how he had commended him for betaking himself to the Duty of a Pontiff, and therefore it would be absurd to oblige him now to act the contrary Part.

BUT all he alledged was to no Purpose, for the Duke of Albany, without waiting for an Answer, as if he were sure of the Pope's Concession, had passed the Po at the Passage of Stellata, in the Milanese,

Milanese, but after Five Days he returned; for the King, on the News that the Ger- mans had begun to arrive in the Enemy's Camp, and that the Duke of Bourbon was gone himself into Germany to raise more Men, thought it proper to keep his whole Army together, till it was increased with a new supply of Swiss and Grisons, whom he had sent to enlist.

In the mean time the military Operations were in a manner at a stand; the King indeed continued the Siege of Pavia, working at the Trenches and Batteries without ceasing, whilst the Imperialists lay quiet, waiting the Return of Bourbon, except that the Marquis of Pescara, who, for his Foresight and Resolution, had the greatest Sway in their Councils, and to whom, without Dispute, was committed the Execution of all their Resolutions, set out from Lodi one Night with Two Hundred Horse and Two Thousand Foot, and unexpectedly entering the Town of Melzi, negligently guarded by Girolamo and Gianfermo de' Trivulzi, with Two Hundred Horse, made them both Prisoners,

A. D. soners, with almost the whole Garrison, ^{1524.} and Girolamo died a few Days after of a Wound he received in the Action.

By this time the Grifons and Swiss Grifons joined the Royal Army, at whose Com-and Swiss ing the Duke of Albany crossed again the join the Po at Stradella, in the Piacentine, the Pope French not being able to dissuade the King from Army. his Enterprize on Naples, and, for Fear perhaps of giving him Cause of Jealousy, he was no longer eager in pressing him against it, but thought it proper however to inform the Imperialists of the Convention he had made with his Majesty, and, at the same time to offer anew his Mediation for a Peace, which he had Reason to think the Parties would now more willingly hearken to, on account of the Difficulties in the Siege of Pavia, and the Danger of the Kingdom of Naples. For this Purpose he sent Pagolo Vettori, the Captain of his Gallies, to the Viceroy, to acquaint him how it had not been in his Power, tho' he had earnestly endeavoured it, to dissuade the King of France from invading the Kingdom of Naples,

The Pope
 sends Pa-golo Vet-tori to the Viceroy.

Naples, nor could he, without drawing A. D. the War on his own Dominions, which, ^{1524.} he was not in a Condition to sustain. refuse a Passage to the French Army ; on the contrary, he was under a Necessity, for his own Safety, to enter into new Conventions with the King ; but he might rest secure that he should not agree to any Article prejudicial to Cæsar, who he was certain could not take a better Step, in his present Condition, than to enter into a Treaty of Peace, which, that it might be negotiated before greater Disorders arose, he intreated the Viceroy to consent to a Cessation of Arms, and to deposit, since the King would not otherwise agree, into neutral Hands what he and the Duke of Milan were in Possession of in the Milanesè. When this should be effected, some proper Expedient might be found out for making an honourable Peace, in which it was intended intirely to separate the Dutchy of Milan from the Crown of France, the Emperor, in Consideration of a proper Sum of Money, giving the Investiture of it to a Second Son of the King ; that

A. D. the Duke of Milan and Duke of Bour- ^{1524.} bon should be honourably provided for, and that the Pope, Venetians and Floren- tines should engage to join the Emperor against France, if the King made any Infringement of what should be stipulated.

 The Imperial Commanders were sensible of their great Difficulties and Dangers, in being obliged, with such a Scarcity of Money, to sustain at the same Time the War in Lombardy, and take Care of the Kingdom of Naples, whilst it was manifest they should receive no Subsidies from the Pope and Florentines, and whilst they were already certain they should be treated in the same manner by the Venetians, who, tho' by enlisting Men they endeavoured to make them believe that they intended to stand to the League, yet deferred with various Excuses its Execution.
 Wherefore the Viceroy, not being averse from an Agreement, was inclined, for the Security of the Kingdom of Naples, to retire thither with his Army.
 But the Marquis of Pescara's Opinion prevailed in the Council, who boldly as well as prudently made it appear that, despising despising all other Dangers, it was necessary to carry on and continue the War in Lombardy, because their Whole depended on a Victory in that Country: That it was not designed to attack the Kingdom of Naples with such Forces, nor could they get thither with the supposed Expedition, for they would meet with many fortified Towns, defended by those whose All depended on their Defence, and therefore would hold out at least for many Months, by which time an End, in all Likelihood, would be put to the War in the Milanese; and, if with Victory, who could doubt but they should immediately free the Kingdom of Naples from the French, tho' Cæsar kept Possession but of one single Tower? By remaining in Lombardy they might possibly conquer both at Milan and Naples, but by going to Naples, Milan would be certainly lost, without lessening the Danger of Naples, which would immediately become the Seat of the War. And what must be our Hopes in returning thither as conquered? Whereas the French, entering in a triumphant Manner, would pre-

A. D.

1524.

Marquis
of Pescara
prevails on the Imperialists not to quit Lombardy.

A. D.
1524.  sently have in their Favour the Cry of the People, who always, from their voluble Nature, Hatred and Fear, are every Day ready to meet the Fortune of the Conqueror ; whence the Kingdom of Naples would no more defend itself than the Dutchy of Milan. Nor has indeed the King of France any other View in dividing his Army, whilst he is still doubtful of his Success in Lombardy, and beginning a new War whilst the first is depending, than that he expects that, out of so great a Concern for the Kingdom of Naples, we should leave him in Prey the Dutchy of Milan. Shall we therefore be directed by the Enemy's Counsels, and at their Pleasure march our Army, so often victorious ? What else can it mean than that, to our eternal Disgrace, we are willing to yield up to the Threats of the Conquered that Glory which we have acquired by fighting so often against them ?

THE Viceroy at last submitted, and sent the Duke of Trajetto to Naples with Orders that, after collecting all the Money that could be got, Ascanio Colonna and the the Barons should attend to the Defence A. D. of that Kingdom ; and, tho' he had ¹⁵²⁴ given a civil Answer to the Pope's Messenger, he now wrote to Rome in a very angry Stile, refusing to hearken to any Accommodation whatsoever. Hence the Pope pretending to be driven by Necessity, because the Duke of Albany daily advanced, declared, not as a Thing before transacted, that he had made an Agreement with the King of France, only by a simple Engagement not to molest one the other : and by a Brief he notified the same to Cæsar's Agents, in which he gave his Reasons, which consisted particularly in the Necessity which had induced him. This Brief was delivered to Cæsar by Giovanni Corsi, the Florentine Ambassador, with such softening Speeches as the Subject required. But Charles, who hitherto seemed to persuade himself that the Pope would not so much as think of abandoning him in his present Distress, answered in great Heat, that neither Hatred nor Ambition, nor particular Views had induced him at first to enter into a War with the King of France, but

A. D. only the Sollicitations and Authority 1524. of Pope Leo, at the Instigation, as he said, of the present Pope, at that Time Cardinal de' Medici, who represented it to him as very dangerous to the public Welfare, that the King of France should have any Footing in Italy : That the said Cardinal had been the Author of the Confederacy which was made for that Purpose before Adrian's Death ; he therefore took it extremely ill, that the Person, who, above all others, ought to have stood by him in Time of Danger, should be the first to abandon him in the Difficulties in which he had himself involved him, and make a Change so hurtful to him without any Necessity. For to what could such a Step be attributed, but to a groundless Fear, whilst Pavia defended itself ? He then observed how much he had taken his Interest at Heart since Leo's Death, especially in two Conclaves, and how he bestirred himself in favour of his Election to the Pontificate, on a Supposition that, thro' his Means, the Liberty and Welfare of Italy would be established. Nor could he he persuade himself that his Holiness ^{A. D.} could ever forget the faithless Treatment ^{1524.} he had received from the King of France, or that he would not consider what he had Reason to hope or fear from a French Victory. He concluded, that, neither on the Pope's unjust and unexpected Resolution, nor for any other Accident, he should be wanting to himself; nor would he have it thought that, for Want of Money, he might change his Sentiments; for he would sooner run the Risque of losing all his Kingdoms and his Life, and that he was so determined to put in Execution what he had proposed, that he prayed to God it might not endanger his eternal Salvation.

To these Complaints the Florentine Minister replied, that the Pope, after his Election to the supreme Dignity, was no longer bound to act as Cardinal de' Medici, but as Roman Pontiff, whose Office it was to make it his Business to compose Quarrels between Christians, which he thought so necessary a Duty that he had often writ to his Majesty on that Subject,

A. D. 1524. } ject, and twice sent to him the Archbishop of Capua to acquaint him of his just Resolution of being neuter. He had communicated these Sentiments to him when the Admiral left Italy, there being no Juncture in which he could treat with greater Honour to himself ; but all the Answer he could draw from your Majesty was, that nothing could be done without the Consent of the King of England. He desired Cæsar to recollect how much the Pope dissuaded the Irruption into Provence, because it wholly broke off all Hopes of Peace ; and how, divining at what after happened, he had foretold that the Necessity laid on the King of France, for collecting an Army might be the Cause of greater and more dangerous Combustions in Italy : That he had employed the Bishop of Verona to persuade the King, after he was in Possession of Milan, and the Viceroy to come into some Terms of Agreement ; but that he had not found in either any Inclination to Peace. That he had since, with many cogent Reasons, and in an absolute Manner, refused to grant a Pass for the French

French Troops through the ecclesiastic State in their Way to the Kingdom of Naples. But the King not only paid no Regard to his Speeches, but sent Troops into the Piacentine, without waiting for his Answer; which had at last induced him to send Pagolo Vettori to the Viceroy to exhort him to a Cessation of Arms, on such Terms as the Times would allow of, and to inform him of the Necessity he was under of securing himself from imminent Danger, especially since the Venetians stood in Suspence, and the King of England was unwilling to concur in the Defence of the Dutchy of Milan, unless Cæsar in Conjunction with him, would commence a War in France. But when he found that the Viceroy rejected all Proposals, and French Troops still advanced he was obliged to make himself sure of the King, and take his Word that he should not be molested, on no other Obligation than not to act against him. But Cæsar complained that the Conditions offered to the Viceroy had been unreasonable, for it was required that he should deposit what he was in Possession

A. D.

1524.

A. D. session of, without any Mention being 1524.
Caesar refuses to make a
 Truce.

 made that the King of France was to do the same; and concluded, that tho' the Marquis of Pescara, in counselling him to come to some Agreement, had represented the Camp full of Disorders, and his Affairs in a dangerous Situation, yet he should not think of suing for Peace, but, depending on the Valour of his Soldiers, hoped he should obtain a Victory whenever the two Armies met.

Duke of Ferrara
 taken into the King's Protection

 THE Siege of Pavia continued all this While, tho' with some Intermission in the Firing of the Artillery, for want of Ammunition. To remedy this Inconvenience, the King was content that the Duke of Ferrara, whom he had lately received into his Protection, on the Obligation of paying down Seventy Thousand Ducats, should account for Twenty Thousand of them in Ammunition, which he sent through the Parmesan and Piacentine, the Countrymen, by the Pope's Order, furnishing Waggon and Oxen for the Carriage; for which heavy Complaints were made by the Viceroy, as if such a Step

THE WARS IN ITALY. 173

Step had been exprefsly taken with an Intent to ferve the King of France. The A. D.
1524.
 King, for the fafe Convoy of thofe Stores, had fent Two Hundred Horfe and Fifteen Hundred Foot, under Giovanni de' Medici, who, from the Beginning of the War, under a Pretence that the Viceroy looked upon him with an evil Eye, and did not allow him Money fufficient for marching his Men, had quitted the Imperial Service, and entered that of France. This Escort was thought fufficient for fecuring the Ammunition, becaufe the Duke of Albany was at Hand, having juft then paffed the Po. But the Viceroy and the Marquis of Pescara, in order to intercept this Supply, laid a Bridge near Cremona, and paffed the Po with Six Hundred Men at Arms, and Eight Thoufand Foot, and came the firft Day to Monticelli; but, on hearing that the King had fent after them Thomas de Foix with Part of the Army, they fpeedily repaffed the River.

As foon as the Viceroy was retired, the Duke of Duke of Albany continued his March Duke of Albany's flow March towards the Naples.
 through the Country of Reggio, and over

A. D. the Appennine Mountains, by the Car- 1524. fagnana; but he proceeded so very slow, that he confirmed the Belief that the King's Design in that Expedition was more to frighten the Germans into a Peace, or to induce them to abandon the Affairs of Lombardy, than out of Hopes of making any Progress. Renzo da Ceri joined the Duke, near Lucca, with Three Thousand Foot, that were come on Board the Fleet, which, in its Passage, took Savona and Varagine, by Composition, and afterwards, returning on the western Riviera of Genoa, kept that City in Awe.

1525. Now follows the Year 1525, in the Beginning of which Don Ugo di Moncada, setting Sail from Genoa with the Spanish Fleet, made a descent with Three Thousand Men at Varagine, which had a small Garrison of Frenchmen: But the French Fleet coming to its Relief, under the Marquis of Saluzzo, the Enemy's Squadron, destitute of Foot, retired, and the French landing, attacked the Spaniards, and, after killing a great Number, broke them, and took Don Ugo Prisoner.

IN

IN the Beginning of this Year the Duke of Albany constrained the Lucchese to pay ^{Contribution of the} him Twelve Thousand Ducats, and to ^{Lucchese.} lend him some Artillery, then advancing thro' the Florentine Dominion, where he was treated as a Friend, he halted at Siena, at the Pope's Desire, who, not being able to redress his Grievances by Authority or Force, was resolved to try how far he could prevail with Art and Industry.

CLEMENT was no ways uneasy at the King's getting Possession of the ^{Clement contrives to make him stay at Siena.} Duchy of Milan, because he imagined that whilst Charles and Francis had both a Footing in Italy, the Apostolic See, and his Pontificate would be secure from the Power of both; and for this very Reason he could not be pleased at the King's making himself Master of the Kingdom of Naples, dreading that a Prince, already so powerful, should be Master at the same time of that Kingdom and the Duchy of Milan. Wherefore, seeking Occasion to defer the March of the Duke of Albany,

A. D. bany, he solicited the King that in his 1525. Passage he would put the Government of Siena on a new Footing; for that City being situated between Rome and Florence, he was desirous to have it under the Direction of his Friends, as it had been, thro' his means, a few Months before. For Cardinal Petrucci dying in the Pontificate of Adrian, Francesco his Nephew, aspiring to his Succession in the Government, was opposed, on account of his arrogant Behaviour, by the Magistracy de' Nove, tho' they were of the same Party. They applied to the Duke of Sessa, Cæsar's Ambassador, and to Cardinal de' Medici, to alter the Constitution of their City, either by restoring it to its pristine Liberty, or investing Fabio, the Son of Ridolfo Petrucci, with that Authority, tho' he had not long before stolen away from Naples. After this Affair had been long deliberated, on Clement's Assumption to the Pontificate, by his and Cæsar's Approbation, Fabio was at last restored to his Father's Place; but not having the Authority his Father had enjoyed, the City in general inclined to Liberty, the Magistracy de' Nove not heartily uniting with him, nor

Government of Siena.

nor well agreeing amongst themselves, A. D.
1525. the Weakness that attends the Power of a single Person, when it is not founded on the Love of the Citizens, nor managed totally, and in all Respects different from the Manner of a Tyrant, was the Cause that, notwithstanding the Place was guarded with his own People, on a popular Tumult, excited one Day by his Adversaries, without the Help of foreign Soldiers, he was easily drove out of the City. Wherefore the Pope, who could not confide in the Multitude, nor in the other Faction, was desirous to replace the Authority in the Hands of the Magistracy de' Nove, that he might afterwards have it in his Power to place at the Helm either Fabio or any other amongst them whom he should think fit. When a Person is once suspected, all his Actions are misconstrued ; so this Step of the Pontiff increased the Notion of the Imperialists, that the Capitulation between Clement and the King contained other Obligations and Matters which would produce Effects of much greater Importance than a Neutrality.

A. D.

1525.

THE Duke's Stay in the Neighbourhood of Siena was the Cause that the Senese, to free themselves from the Molestations of the Army, conferred a very ample Authority on those Citizens in whom the Pope could confide for settling the Form of Government. After this was accomplished, the Duke receiving some Artillery, and a certain Sum of Money from the Senese, proceeded forwards, but with his usual Slowness. From Monte Fiascone he repaired to Rome, to have a Conference with his Holiness; then crossing the Tiber at Fiano, he quartered his Men in the Towns of the Orsini, where they were assembling new Troops, raised in Rome by the Pope's Permission, who gave the same Liberty to the Colonnas, who were gathering Soldiers for the Defence of the Kingdom of Naples, and had their Head Quarters at Marino. But the People in general had but an indifferent Opinion of the Duke of Albany's Expedition, both on account of his tardy Motions, and for his Want of Money.

THE

THE WARS IN ITALY.

179

A. D.

1525.

THE Eyes, Ears, and Thoughts of the Public were now wholly employed on the Affairs of Lombardy, which seeming to be drawing to an End, by reason of different Incidents, excited sometimes the Hopes, and sometimes the Fears of each Party. In Pavia the Besieged were in great Want of Money, and Ammunition for their Artillery. Their Wine began to fail, and all other Provisions, Bread excepted. The German Foot, insolent enough of themselves, demanded their Pay at the Instigation of their Officers, in a sort of a riotous Manner, which gave a Suspicion that they had secretly agreed with the King of France. On the other hand the Viceroy, on the Approach of the Duke of Bourbon, who was bringing with him from Germany Five Hundred Burgundian Horse, and Six Thousand German Foot, which had been enlisted with Money of the King of the Romans, was gone to Lodi, where the whole Army was to rendezvous, and, as was thought, would not be inferior to that of the French; but there was no Money,

Want of Necessaries in Pavia.

Duke of Bourbon brings Troops
from Germany.

A. D.
 1525. } nor Means of procuring any, for marching or subsisting the Army. They quite despaired of getting Money from the Pope or Florentines, as also from the Venetians, who, after so many Delays and Excuses, had declared at last to the Protonotary Carracciolo, the Emperor's Ambassador, that they should regulate their Proceedings by those of the Pope, by whose Means, it was thought, they had with all Secrecy agreed with the King of France to stand neuter. They certainly pressed his Holiness to bring into Italy Ten Thousand Swiss, offering to contribute Half the Expence, that they might not be under any Consternation at the Victory of either Party. The Pope approved of the Scheme, but for Want of Money, and on account of the Pope's natural Indolence, it was executed so slowly, a long Time was consumed before he sent into Switzerland the Bishop of Veruli, to dispose the Helvetic Body to grant his Request.

A. D.

1525.

THE Difficulties in Pavia were, in some measure, removed by the Vigilance and Industry of the Viceroy and other Commanders ; for some Merchants being sent to the French Camp to sell Wine, Antonio da Leva, at the Sign agreed upon, sent a Party that Way with Orders to begin skirmishing ; which creating a Noise, the Merchants, in the Confusion, staved a large Butt of Wine, and taking out a small Pot, which was concealed in it, containing Three Thousand Ducats, ran with it into Pavia. The Receipt of this small Sum made the Germans sensible how difficult it was to supply them with Money, and made them more patient ; and the Death of their Leader now happening, so opportunely that it was believed he was poisoned by Antonio da Leva, removed the main Fomenter of the Tumults.

IN the mean time the Marquis of Pescara laid Siege to Casclano, guarded by Fifty Horse, and Four Hundred Italian Foot, which he obliged to surrender at

A. D. Discretion. But Bourbon being now arrived with the German Foot, nothing else retarded the Generals, anxious for the Danger of Pavia, but the extream Want of Money ; for they not only had not a Sufficiency to pay the Army, but laboured under great Difficulties how to raise what was necessary for moving the Ammunition and Artillery. In so great a Distress, by flattering the Soldiery with the Honour and Riches they would acquire by gaining a Victory, reminding them of their Profits in former Battles, and raising their natural Indignation against the French, they prevailed on the Spanish Foot to promise that they would serve for a Month without demanding any Money, and the Germans to be satisfied with what would barely suffice for purchasing necessary Food. But the greatest Difficulty was how to content the Men at Arms and Light Horse, that were quartered in the Villages of the Ghiaradadda and Cremonese. They had not received for a long Time any Pay, and represented that it was impossible for them to follow the Army without Money 1525.

 Marquis
 of Pescara
 prevails
 on the Foot to wait for their Pay.

Money to provide for themselves and their Horses. They complained that their Service was less valued than that of the Foot, amongst whom, at times, some Money had been distributed, but none to them for a long time past ; yet they were not inferior to them either in Courage or Fidelity, but much their Superiors in Birth and past Merits.

THE Marquis of Pescara allayed this Uneasiness by going to their Quarters, and sometimes excusing Matters, sometimes comforting, and sometimes reproving them, represented to them in a winning Manner, that the more they were illustrious for their Virtue and Courage, the more they ought to strive not to be outdone in their Fidelity and Love to Cæsar, whose Glory and Honour were not only at Stake at this Juncture, but also all his Dominions in Italy : That if they sincerely desired his Grandeur, and earnestly wished him well, they could never have a better Opportunity of manifesting their Sentiments ; and, since they had so often exposed their Lives for his Service, with what

A. D. 1525. Shame must they be branded, if, by an unheard of Resolution, they should refuse to serve for the Want of a few dirty Pence.

and upon the Horse. The Persuasions and Authority of the Marquis had such Effect, that they agreed to serve a Month, and be contented with a very small Portion of their Pay.

THE Army then being assembled, and computed to contain Seven Hundred Men at Arms, the same Number of Light Horse, One Thousand Italian Foot, and above Sixteen Thousand between Spaniards and Germans, they set out from Lodi the 25th Day of January, and arrived the same Evening at Marignano, as if they intended to go to Milan, in hopes that either the King, in Fear of losing the City, might break up the Siege of Pavia, or that the French Soldiery would abandon Milan; but after they had passed the River Lambro, near Vidigolfo, they directed their March to Pavia.

THE King paid for Thirteen Hundred Lances, Ten Thousand Swiss, Four Thousand Germans, Five Thousand French,

French, and Seven Thousand Italians; A. D. 1525. but by the Negligence of the Ministers, and Frauds of the Officers, the Number of the Foot was much less. Teodoro da Trivulzi guarded Milan with Three Hundred Lances, Six Thousand Foot between Grifons and Vallese, and Three Thousand French; but as soon as the Imperial Army moved towards Pavia, the King, ordering but Two Thousand Foot to be left in Milan, recalled the rest to strengthen his Army. On the Enemy's March the King held a Council of War, in which Tremouille, Palisse, Thomas de Foix, and several other general Officers, persuaded the King to break up the Siege of Pavia, and post his Army either at the Monastery of the Carthusians, or at Binasco, which were strong Situations (as there are several in that Country, rendered so by the Canals cut for overflowing the Meadows) demonstrating that by this means they might soon obtain a Victory without Blood or Danger, because the Imperial Army, being destitute of Money, could not keep together many Days, but would be obliged to break up

The King holds a Council, is persuaded to raise the Siege of Pavia.

A. D. up, or quarter dispersed in different Towns.

1525.

That the Germans in Pavia, lest they should be charged with making their Want of Pay an Excuse for covering their Cowardice, had, for several Months, bore patiently that Inconvenience, but would, as soon as the Siege should be raised, demand Payment; and as their Commanders had neither Money nor any apparent Hopes, with which they might, tho' vainly, feed them, they would excite some dangerous Tumult: That nothing else kept the Enemy together, but the Hopes of coming to an immediate Engagement, which being put out of their Power, and the War protracted, they would be brought into Difficulties and Confusion. They laid before his Majesty the Danger of being situated between a Town garri-soned with Five Thousand Foot of a most warlike Nation, and an Army marching to his Succour, powerful for its Number, and for the Valour and Experience of its Leaders and Soldiers, elated with their former Victories, and placing their Hopes in a Battle: That no Infamy attended a Retreat made by Prudence, Prudence, and not out of Fear; when made A. D. to avoid leaving to the Power of Chance ^{1525.} what is certain, and when the speedy End put to the War shall demonstrate to the whole World the Reasonableness of this Counsel: And no Victory could certainly be more advantageous, honourable, or glorious, than that which is gained without Loss or Bloodshed: That the chief Praise in the Art of War consisted more in a General's not exposing his Army to unnecessary Dangers, and in rendering vain the Artifices and Designs of the Enemy, than in fighting bloody Battles. The same Counsel was given to the King by the Pope, to whom the Marquis of Pescara, under Apprehensions from so great a Poverty in the Camp, had before signified that the Difficulties which Cæsar's Army laboured under were such that he almost despaired of Success. But the King, whose Resolutions were intirely governed by the Counsels of the Admiral, laying a greater Strefs on vain Rumours, and on every slight and variable Accident, than on Events of Moment and Importance, thought it would be a great Reflection on his Honour,

A. D. 1525. nour, that an Army, in which he was present in Person, should retire with a Show of Fear at the Approach of an Enemy. He let himself also be worked upon by a Suggestion, than which nothing can be more imprudent in a General, that he was in a manner bound to act in Conformity to some idle Words he had dropped, because he had often publicly declared, and signified all over Italy, that he would sooner chuse Death than retire from before Pavia without taking it. He trusted in the Easiness of fortifying his Camp in such a Manner, as it should not be penetrated by any sudden Assault. He hoped that, on account of the Want of Money, every little Delay would disorder the Enemy, who having no Means to purchase Provisions, and necessitated to plunder the Country for Subsistence, would not be able to keep their Camp. He hoped also to obstruct the Conveyance of Provisions to their Camp, as the greatest Part he knew must come from Cremona, because he had taken anew into his Service Giovan Lodovico Pallavicino, with a View that that he might either seize on Cremona, in which was a small Garrison, or at least secure all the Avenues by which Provisions might come from that City. These Reasons confirmed the King in his obstinate persevering in the Siege of Pavia, and to prevent the Entrance of Succours into that Town he altered the Disposition of his Army. The King himself was at first quartered on the Side of Borgorato, at the Abbey of San Lanfranco, situated half a Mile beyond Pavia, beyond the Road that leads from Pavia to Milan, and on the River Tesino, near the Place where it had been attempted to divide the Waters. Palisse with the Van and Swiss lay at the Ronche in the Suburbs, near the Abbey of Santa Justina, and had erected Fortifications at the Churches of San Piero, Sant' Apollonia, and San Girolamo; and Giovanni de' Medici was posted with his Horse and Foot at the Church of San Salvatore. But, on Advice of the March of the Enemy from Lodi, the King removed his Quarters to the Park, at the Palace of Mirabello, on this Side Pavia, leaving the Grisons at San

A. D. San Lanfranco, but without altering the ^{1525.} Position of his Van. At last he changed once more his Quarters, and lodged at the Monasteries of San Pagolo, and San Jacopo, convenient Places, on Eminences overlooking the Country, very near Pavia, but a little out of the Park. Monf.
D'Alençon was removed with the Rear to Mirabello, and for Conveniency of succouring one another Part of the Park Wall was broke down. The Camp extended downwards as far as the Tesino, and upwards to the Road that leads to Milan. By this Disposition Pavia was surrounded, and as the French had the Command of the Rivers Gravallone and Tesino, and of the Torretta which lies over against Darsina, the Imperialists could not get into Pavia without crossing the Tesino, or making their Way through the Park. The whole Care of managing the Army lay on the Admiral, the King wasting the greatest Part of his Time either in Idleness or in vain Pleasures, without finding Leisure for Business or serious Thoughts, holding in Contempt all other Commanders, consulting only with the Admiral,

THE WARS IN ITALY. 191

Admiral, and hearkening also to Anne de Montmorency, and Philip Chabot, Lord of Brione, great Favourites, but of little Experience in military Affairs. Nor did the Numbers in the King's Army answer common Report, nor even what the King imagined himself. For one Part of the Cavalry was with the Duke of Albany, another was left with Teodoro Trivulzio in Garrison at Milan, and many having their Quarters situated in the neighbouring Towns and Villages, there never were constantly in the Camp above Eight Hundred Lances at a Time. And as to the Foot, tho', thro' the Frauds of the Captains, and Negligence of the royal Ministers, his Majesty paid for an unreasonable Number, yet they were far short of what was imagined by the Public. The Italian Officers, more than the rest, were concerned in the Cheat; for, tho' they received large Sums for great Bodies of Men, they had but small Numbers to pay. The same was the Case with the French Foot; and Two Thousand Vallese quartered at San Salvatore, between San Lanfranco and Pavia, had been suddenly

A. D. 1525. denly attacked by the Besieged, and disperfed.

IN this Situation of Affairs the Imperial Generals, as soon as they had passed the Lambro, approached the Castle of Sant^o Angelo, which being situated between Lodi and Pavia, if not in their Possession, would give great Impediment to the Conveyance of Provisions from Lodi to the Army. Pirro, Brother of Federigo da Bozzole, guarded this Place with Two Hundred Horse, and Eight Hundred Foot, and the King a few Days before, unwilling to expose the Garrison to Danger, had sent this Federigo, with Jacques Chabanes, to view the Strength of the Castle, who reported that the Garrison was sufficient for its Defence. But Experience proved their Mistake, for as soon as Ferdinando Davalo approached the Town with the Spanish Foot, and had ruined the Defences with the Artillery, the Besieged terrified retired to the Fort, and a few Hours after agreed that Pirro, Emilio Cavriana, and Three Sons of Febus da Gonzaga, should remain remain Prisoners, and the rest giving up their Arms and Horses, might depart on their Parole of not serving against Cæsar for one Month.

A. D.

1525.

THE King had sent for Two Thousand Italian Foot of those from Marseilles, which were in Savona. These Troops being arrived in the Territory of Alessandria, near the River Urbe, Gasparo Maino, who was in Garrison in Alessandria with Seventeen Hundred Foot, sallying forth with a few of them, fell upon the Italians, and finding them weary with their Journey and unguarded, because they had no Suspicion of being attacked, broke them with Ease, and they fled to Castellaccio, where soon after they surrendered with Seventeen Colours. Nor had Lodovico Pallavicino better Success in his Expedition : That Officer entered Casal Maggiore with Four Hundred Horse, and Two Thousand Foot ; and the Town having no Walls he made some Fortifications, and soon after taking Possession of San Giovanni in Croce, he began from that Place to make Excursions all over the Country,

A. D. making it his particular Business to cut off 1525. Provisions. Wherefore Francesco Sforza, who was at Cremona, with great Difficulty, got together Fourteen Hundred Foot, which, with a few Horse of Ridolfo da Camerino, and those of his own Guards, he sent, under Alessandro Bentivoglio, towards Casal Maggiore. When they approached that Place, Pallavicino, on the 19th of February, trusting to his Superiority in Numbers, without waiting for Francesco Rangone, who was expected with a Supply both of Horse and Foot, sallied forth and attacked Bentivoglio; but whilst he was rallying his Men, who were retiring, he was thrown from his Horse, made a Prisoner, and all his Troops were broken and dispersed.

To these Misfortunes was added an Accident of great Importance to the French: For Gian Jacopo de' Medici, of Milan, Governor of Mus, where he had been once committed by the Duke of Mi- lan for the Murder of Monsignorino Vis- conti, having, in the Night Time, laid an Ambush near the Fort of Chiavenna, situated situated on an Eminence at the Head A. D. of the Lake, at some Distance from the ^{1525.} Houses of the Town, seized on the Governor as he had been walking out to take the Air, and carrying him immediately before the Gate of the Fort, and threatening to kill him, prevailed on his Wife to deliver up the Fort; then suddenly, at the Head of Three Hundred Men which he had placed in another Ambush, entered thro' the Fort into the Town, and took it.

This Accident gave such Umbrage to the Leagues of the Grisons that a few Days before the Battle they recalled the Six Thousand Grisons that were in the King's Army.

ABOUT this Time the Chevalier Casale came to the Imperial Camp, sent thither by the King of England, with mighty Promises; for that King began to grow envious of the Prosperity of the King of France, and, being also provoked that the French had taken some English Ships in the Scottish Seas, threatened to make War in France, and

A. D. 1525. was desirous of supporting the Imperial Army; and for that Purpose had commissioned Pacey, who was at Trento, to go to Venice, and insist, in his Name, on that Senate's Performance of the Articles of the League, to which he thought he might the more easily induce them, because Cæsar had put the Investiture of Francesco Sforza in the Hands of the Viceroy, with Orders to dispose of it according to the Occurrences of Affairs. King Henry also commissioned his Ambassador at Rome to solicit the Pope to favour Cæsar's Cause, from which he excused himself on account of the late Convention he had made with France for his own Security, without engaging to act offensively against Cæsar. He complained also that, after the Return of the Army from Provence, Twenty Days had passed before he could be informed of their Designs, and whether they had a Mind to defend or abandon the State of Milan.

BUT

BUT now the Treaties and Negotiation of Princes, and the Diligence and Sollicitude of Ambassadors were become of little Importance ; for the Armies now approaching, the Result of the whole War, and of the Difficulties and Dangers which had been undergone for so many Months, were reduced to the Fortune of a few Hours. For the Imperial Army, after the Acquisition of Sant' Angelo, still advancing, encamped the 1st Day of February at Vistarino, and the next Day at Lardirago, and Sant' Alessio, beyond the little River Lolona, Four Miles from Pavia, and Three from the French Camp. On the 3d of February they came and encamped in Prati, towards the Gate of Santa Justina, extending themselves between Prati, Trelevero, and la Motta, and in a Wood near San Lazzaro, which Posts were Two Miles and a Half distant from Pavia, and a Mile from the Van of the French, and Half a Mile from the Ramparts and Ditches of their Camp, and were so near that the Artillery on both

A. D. Sides did considerable Execution. The 1525. Imperialists had taken Possession of Belgiojoso, and all the Towns in the Country behind them except San Colombano, which continued in the Hands of the French, tho' blocked up so closely that none could stir out. They had found great Quantities of Provisions in Sant' Angelo and Belgiojoso, and, that they might be more plentifully supplied, they endeavoured to get the Command of the Tesino, as they had already of the Po, by which they obstructed the Convoys to the French Camp. Santa Croce was in their Possession, but they did not chuse to quarter Men in the Charter-House, which had been abandoned by the King, when he removed to Mirabello, lest the Provisions which must have been conveyed thither might be in Danger. The French were in Possession of San Lazzaro, but the Enemy's Fire obliged them to quit it.

BETWEEN both Camps was a running Stream called Vernacula, which has its Rise in the Park, and, passing between San Lazzaro and San Piero in Verge, ^{A. D. 1525.} falls into the Tefino. The Imperialists intent on passing this Brook, as a Matter of great Importance, that they might advance with the less Difficulty, met with a stout Defence from the French, who were assisted by the Depth of the Channel, and the Height of the Banks, which, with the Care that every Particular took to fortify his own Quarter, rendered the Passage very difficult. The King's Quarters in Front, in his Rear, and on the left Flank, had thick Ramparts, surrounded with Ditches, and strengthened with Redoubts, the right Flank being defended by the Wall of the Park, which was reputed very strong. The like Fortifications surrounded the Camp of the Imperialists, who were in Possession of all the Territory of San Lazzaro, towards Belgiojoso, down to the Po, and by that Situation had Plenty of Provisions. The Ramparts of the two Camps were but Forty Paces asunder, and their Redoubts at so little a Distance, that they were within Musquet-shot.
San

A. D.

1525.

THIS was the Disposition of both Armies on the 8th Day of February; both Sides were continually skirmishing, but each kept themselves in their strong Camp, not chusing to fight to Disadvantage. The Imperialists imagined they had already done great Matters by approaching so near Pavia, as to be enabled, in case of a Battle, to have the Assistance of the Garrison. In Pavia there was great Want of Powder, wherefore the Imperialists sent Fifty Men on Horseback, each carrying behind him a Bag of Powder: These, in the Night-time, entering the Milan Road, waited there till the Imperialists gave an Alarm to the French Camp, and then conveyed themselves safely into Pavia, from whence Antonio da Leva made frequent Sallies, infesting the Enemy by different Ways. One Day he attacked and broke the Garrisons of Borgorato, and San Lanfranco, and carried off Three Pieces of Artillery, and several Waggon of Ammunition.

IN

IN this State of Affairs one cannot well express the Vigilance, Industry and Fatigues both of Body and Mind of the Marquis of Pescara, who, Day and Night, never ceased to annoy the Enemy by Skirmishes, Alarms, and casting up new Works, always advancing by Trenches, Ditches, and Redoubts. The Imperials were at Work on a Platform upon the Canal, and the French greatly annoying the Workmen with Two Pieces of Artillery planted at San Lazzaro, they pointed their Artillery that Way, and ruining the Place constrained them to abandon it. The French suffered much from the Artillery of the said Platform, and likewise from another erected at Pavia; and the Spaniards fortified themselves in such a Manner with Redoubts and Ramparts, and were so well disposed, that they annoyed very much the French Camp, without receiving much Hurt themselves. The French therefore changed the Position of their Artillery, in order to take the Spaniards in Flank, whilst they were vigo-

A. D. vigorously continuing their Works, in order to gain Ground Inch by Inch. ^{1525.} This Position necessarily occasioned frequent Skirmishes, in which the French were almost constantly worsted. All this While neither of the Parties intermitted their Operations, on account of the Negotiation of a Truce, of which the Pope's Nuncios in both Armies were continually treating: Nor would the King give any Attention to his intimate Friends, or to the Pope, who often counselled him, in order to avoid so great a Danger, to decamp with his Army from Pavia, because, on account of the Enemy's Want of Money, he would necessarily obtain a Victory in a very short Time, and without Blood.

On the 17th Day of February the Garrison sallied out and attacked the Regiment of Giovanni de' Medici, who gallantly repulsed them, and returning afterwards to shew the Admiral the Spot of Ground where the Action happened, whilst he was pointing out the Particulars, by a Volley of Shot fired from from a House, he received a Wound A. D. in the Heel, which broke the Bone, ^{1525.} to the King's great Concern, and it was necessary to have him carried to Piacenza. On account of this Accident the Skirmishes were not so frequent and vigorous, and the Fierceness of the French in their Assaults was immediately allayed; whilst those in Pavia made every Day bolder Sallies, and having burnt the Abbey of San Lanfranco, were become too hard for the French, who seemed very much dispirited. The Marquis of Pescara on the 20th, before Day, with Three Thousand Spanish Foot, attacked the Enemy's Redoubts, and mounting the Ramparts, killed above Five Hundred Foot, and brought off three Pieces of Cannon.

At last the Imperial Generals, being sensible they could no longer remain in that Situation for Want of Money, and considering that, if they retired, not only Pavia would be lost, but that there remained no Hopes of defending the other Places they possessed in the Dutchy

A. D. chy of Milan, full also of Confidence 1525. of obtaining a Victory thro' the Valour of their Soldiers, and relying on the Multitude of Disorders in the French Army, many of the Enemy's Foot being gone off, and the Number remaining not answering by far to those paid for, on the Night before the 25th of February, a Day dedicated according to Christian Rites, to the Apostle Matthias, and Cæsar's Birth-Day, took a Resolution to march to Mirabello, where some Companies of the Enemy's Horse and Foot were posted, with an Intent, if the French did not move, to raise the Siege of Pavia, and if they moved to try the Fortune of a Battle. With this View, on the Beginning of the Night, to fatigue the Enemy, they often beat to Arms, making a Feint of attacking them on the Side of the Po, at the Tesino, and at San Lazzaro. At Midnight an Order was issued for all the Soldiers to put on a White Shirt over their Arms, as a Sign to distinguish themselves from the French. The Horse formed themselves into Two Squadrons,
 and

and the Foot into Four Bodies; the first of which was composed of Six ^{A. D. 1525.} Thousand Germans, Spaniards and Italians in equal Proportions under the Marquis del Guasto; the second consisted only of Spaniards, under the Marquis of Pescara, the third and fourth were Germans, commanded by the Viceroy and the Duke of Bourbon. Arriving at the Park Wall some Hours before Day, by the united Help of Bricklayers and Soldiers, they threw down Sixty Braces of the Wall. The first Body then marched to Mirabello, and the rest towards the French Camp. But the King, on Notice that the Enemy had entered the Park, imagining they were proceeding to Mirabello, marched out of his Entrenchments in order to fight in the open Field on even Ground, chusing rather to fight there on account of the Superiority of his Horse. At the same time he ordered his Artillery to be pointed towards the Enemy, which taking them in Flank did some Damage to the Rear. The Imperialists in the mean time attacked the King's Squadron

{
1525.
A. D. dron, which used to be commonly the main Battle, but by the March of the Squadrons was become the Van, where the King, fighting very gallantly, sustained the Shock of the Enemy, who however, with their Fire Arms obliged those about him to give Way, till the Swiss arriving, and the Cavalry charging them in Flank, the Spaniards were repulsed. But the Viceroy, called by the Marquis of Pescara to his Assistance, and coming up with the German Foot, the Swiss were easily broken with great Slaughter, their Valour no way corresponding that Day with the Courage they had shown in former Battles. The King in the mean time, having been with a great Number of his Men at Arms in the Midst of the Battle, and endeavoured to stop the Flight of his Men, after a long Combat, his Horse killed under him, himself wounded, tho' but slightly, in the Face, and in the Hand, and fallen to the Ground, was taken by some Soldiers, who did not know him.
 But when the Viceroy came up he discovered himself to him, who, after kissing

kissing his Hand with profound Reverence, received him Prisoner in the Name of the Emperor. By this Time Guaſto with the first Squadron had broke the French Horse posted at Mirabello, and Leva, who, as some say, had, for this Purpose, demolished so much of the Wall of Pavia, that One Hundred and Fifty Horse might sally out abreast, attacked the Enemy's Rear, in such a manner that the whole Army betook themselves to Flight, but were all intercepted and plundered, except the Rear of the Horse under Alençon, which retired intire at the Beginning of the Fight.

IT was a received Opinion that the French, between killed and drowned in their Flight in the Tesino, lost above Eight Thousand Men, and about Twenty of the first Rank of the French Nobility, amongst whom were the Admiral, Jacques Chabanes, Palisse, Tremouille, the Grand Ecuyer, Aubigny, Boissy, and L'Escud, who expired of his Wounds soon after he was taken.

Amongst

A. D. 1525. Amongst the Prisoners were the King of Navarre, the Bastard of Savoy, Montmorency, St. Paul, Brion, de l'Aval, Chandiou, Imbercourt, Galeazzo Visconti, Federigo da Bozzole, Bernabo Visconti, and an infinite Number of Gentlemen and almost all the General Officers, which were not killed. Girolamo Leandro, the Pope's Nuncio, was also taken, but released by Order of the Viceroy. Of the Prisoners St. Paul, and Federigo da Bozzole were committed to the Castle of Pavia, but soon after, by corrupting the Spanish Guards, found Means to make their Escape.

Of the Imperialists were killed about Seven Hundred, but no general Officer except Ferrando Castriota, Marquis of Sant' Angelo: The Plunder was so great, that no Soldiers in Italy were ever richer. The Marquis of Pescara received Two Wounds, one of them with a Musquet, and Antonio da Leva was slightly wounded in his Leg. Of so great an Army Alençon only, with Four Hundred Lances which he commanded manded in the Rear, saved themselves A. D. without fighting, being neither attacked ^{1525.} nor pursued; but leaving behind them their Carriages, they rode with full Speed into Piedmont. As soon as the News of this Victory reached Milan, Teodoro Trivulzi, who was left there with Four Hundred Lances, departed thence towards Musocco, and was followed by all the Soldiers, in scattered Bodies; by which means, the same Day the Battle was fought, the whole Dutchy of Milan was freed from the French. The Day after the Victory the King was conducted to the Castle of Piz-zichitone, because the Duke, for his own Security, would by no means consent that he should be conducted to the Castle of Milan, and except his Liberty, for that was guarded with the utmost Care, he was, in all other Respects, treated and honoured as a King.

The End of the Fifteenth Book.

Francesco Guicciardini's
H I S T O R Y
 O F
The W A R S in I T A L Y.

 B O O K XVI. ending the Vol.

T H E C O N T E N T S.

The Victory of Charles alarms the Italians. Tumult in Siena. Francis, refusing to sign the Articles offered him, is carried Prisoner into Spain. The Duke of Milan and others conspire against Cæsar. The Marquis of Pescara discovers the Plot, and gets Possession of Part of the Dutchy of Milan. Conditions and Ceremony with which the King of France is set at Liberty.

A. D.
 1525.

THE French Army being thus not only overthrown by the Imperialists, in the Battle fought in the Park of Pavia, but the most Christian

Christian King made Prisoner, and the greatest Part of the Officers and the French Nobility killed or taken near their King, the Swiss, who had hitherto made War in Italy with so great a Reputation, having behaved so basely, the Residue of the Army, after losing their Camp, making no Stop till they arrived at the Foot of the Mountains, and, what mightily added to the Reputation of the Conquerors, the Cæsarean Generals having acquired so memorable a Victory with so little Blood on their Side, it is not to be expressed what an Astonishment so great an Event excited in all the Potentates of Italy, who, finding themselves in a manner wholly disarmed, were struck with the greatest Terror at the Thoughts of Cæsar's having so very powerful an Army in the Field, without an Enemy to oppose him. Nor were their Fears so much allayed by what many reported of Cæsar's good Disposition and inclination to Peace, without any Desire of usurping the States of others as they were increased on the Confidence

A. D. 1525. ration of the Danger that, moved either by Ambition, a Passion natural to all Princes, or by that Insolence which commonly attends Victories, and besides instigated by the forward Zeal of those who had the management of his Affairs in Italy, or, lastly, stimulated by his Council and whole Court, he would not neglect so fair an Opportunity, of itself sufficient to warm the coldest Disposition, to turn his whole Thoughts on making himself Lord of all Italy; especially as they were not ignorant how easy it was for any great Prince, and much more for a Roman Emperor, to justify their Undertakings under Pretences which might have the Appearance of Reason and Honour. This Fear did not only seize on those Potentates that were of lesser Force and Authority, but even the Pope and the Venetians seemed to be more alarmed than the rest. The last, not only from a Consciousness of having, without any just Cause, failed in fulfilling the Articles of their Confederacy, but much more on the Remembrance of the antient Animofities, fities, and frequent Provocations passed ^{A. D.} between them and the House of ^{1525.} Austria, and of the vexatious Wars in which they had but a few Years before been engaged with Maximilian, when the Name and Memory of the almost dormant Pretensions of the Rights of the Empire to their Dominions on the Terra Firma were strongly revived; and because they were also sensible that whoever aimed at establishing his Grandeur in Italy must of necessity apply himself to depress the too exorbitant Power of their Republick. The Pope had Reason for Apprehensions because, setting aside the Majesty of the Pontificate, which had suffered frequent Eclipses from the Greatness of the Emperors, even in those antient Times when a greater Reverence was paid by the World to the Apostolic See, he was in every other Respect exposed to Injuries; for he was disarmed, without Money, and the Ecclesiastic State, in which there are but few fortified Towns, was in a very weak Condition, the People neither united nor steady in their Affections to their

O 3

4. D. their Prince, but on the contrary almost 1525. the whole Dominion of the Church divided into the two Factions of Guelfs and Ghibellines, the latter, from an inveterate and almost natural Impression, inclined to the Imperial Authority, and the City of Rome, above all others, weak, and infected with these Seeds of Contention.

To this must be added Clement's Sollicitude for the Affairs of Florence, which depending on him, and concerning his own Grandeur, as well as the antient Splendor of his Family, he had their Interests perhaps as much at Heart, as those of the Church. Nor was it less easy to make Alterations in that State than in the others; for the City of Florence, after the Expulsion of the Medici in the Passage of King Charles, having, under the Name of Liberty, tasted the Sweets of popular Government for the Space of Eighteen Years, was become dissatisfied at the Return of that Family, and few of the Citizens were heartily pleased at their Power. The Pope was also extremely treably apprehensive that to such inviting Opportunities would be added a strong Inclination to fall upon that State. But there were Grounds besides to fear that this Inclination would not abate, not so much because the less powerful is never wholly secure from the Ambition of the more potent, as from an Apprehension that on several accounts his Name was at that Time become odious to Cæsar. He reasoned within himself, that tho', during the Reign of Leo, and after his own Promotion to the Cardinalship, he had taken a World of Pains for advancing the Grandeur of Cæsar, and that tho' Leo and himself, with excessive Cost and Danger, had opened the Way to so great a Power in Italy, and that after his own Assumption to the Pontificate he had furnished Money to his Generals whilst the Admiral was in Italy, and procured a Contribution from the Florentines, and had not recalled from the Army the Troops of the Church and of that Republic, yet, either on considering that it belonged to his Office to act

A. D.

1525.

A. D. 1525. as a Father and common Pastor between Christian Princes, and to be rather a Peacemaker than a Fomenter of Wars, or beginning, tho' late, to be alarmed at so much Grandeur, he had betimes retired from following his Fortune, and therefore would not be persuaded to renew the Confederacy made for the Defence of Italy by his Predecessor. And when the Year before Cæsar's Army with the Duke of Bourbon had entered Provence, he had not consented to assist it with Money, which tho' it had given no just Cause for Complaint to the Imperial Minist'ers, his Holiness not being bound by the League of Adrian to act in Concert against the French in the Wars of Italy, yet this Manner of Proceeding laid a Foundation for their thinking that he no longer heartily concurred in Cæsar's Interest, and, on the contrary, greatly lessened the Opinion which they had hitherto entertained of his Faithfulness; acting like Men who, led only by Passion or Necessity, resented it as an Injury, if others did not lend the same Assistance towards carrying on their particular Enterprises, concerted ^{A. D.} with a View to seize on France, as they ^{1525.} had before done to Undertakings of universal Concern, set on foot with a Pretence of securing Italy from the French Power. But these Complaints and Dissatisfactions begun and discovered themselves, when the King of France marched on his Expedition against Milan; for tho' the Pope, as he afterwards wrote in his querulous Brief to Cæsar, had privately supplied the French with a Sum of Money in their Retreat from Marseilles, yet he had never afterwards held any confidential Correspondence with them: But as soon as the King had taken Milan, seeing his Affairs in so prosperous a Condition, he had indeed entered with him into Articles, tho' he excused it to Cæsar by alledging that his Generals, at that Juncture, not having, for Twenty Days together, let him into any of their Designs, despairing of the Defence of that State, and under Apprehensions also for Naples, and the Duke of Albany pushing forwards with his Troops towards Tuscany, he had been obliged
their

A. D. obliged to think of Measures for his own ^{1525.} Security. The Regard however to his own Danger had not so much influenced him as not to make him agree on Conditions tending as much to Cæsar's Interest as his own, and not to despise the immense Offers made him by the King of France to intice him into a Confederacy with him.

BUT his Excuses had not been sufficient to quiet the Minds of Cæsar and his Ministers, who were under great Concern, not so much because they saw themselves wholly deprived of any Hopes of future Subsidies from him, as because they doubted that the Capitulation contained something more than an Obligation to a bare Neutrality, because they thought that on all Occasions he had spoken too favourably of the French Enterprize, and were also apprehenfivè that he had drawn in the Venetians to follow his Example, the Truth of which was afterwards confirmed by Letters and Briefs found in the King's Tent after the Battle. In the last Place these Jealousies and Dissatisfactions were greatly increased, when A. D. 1525. the Pope permitted the Ammunition, furnished by the Duke of Ferarra to the French King at the Siege of Pavia, to pass through his Dominions, and to be forwarded by the Assistance of his Subjects, but much more at the March of the Duke of Albany on the Enterprise against the Kingdom of Naples; for he was not only treated as a Friend through all the Ecclesiastic and Florentine States, but also stopped many Days about Siena, in order to reform, at the Request of the Pontiff, the Government of that City. And tho' this Stay protracted the March of the Duke to the Kingdom of Naples, and had been procured by Clement principally for that Purpose, because he would have been very uneasy to see the same Person Lord of Naples and Milan, yet the Imperialists had put such a Construction on this Step, as to infer that the Convention between him and the King of France contained something more than a simple Engagement not to act offen-
the

A. D. 1525. offensively against each other. On these Considerations the Pope had just Reason to fear, not only, like all the rest of the Italian Powers, that, when proper Time and Occasion offered, he should be attacked by the Imperialists, but that the State of the Church, or that of the Florentines, would be immediately invaded without waiting for a fairer Opportunity. And this Fear was increased when the Duke of Albany, on advice of the King's Misfortune, having retired, for his Security, from Monte Rotondo towards Bracciano, and ordered thither One Hundred and Fifty of his Horse from Rome (which the Pope, on receiving Intelligence that the Duke of Sessa and the Imperialists were preparing to fall upon them, caused to be escorted thither by his own Guards) it happened that Four Hundred Horse and Twelve Hundred Foot of the Troops of the Orsini, in their March from Sermoneta, being pursued by Giulio Colonna with a good Body of Horse and Foot, were routed by him at the Abby of the Three Fountains, and flying flying into Rome for Shelter thro' the ^{A. D. 1525.} Gates of San Pagolo and San Sebastiano, the Colonnas entered with them, and in Campo di Fiore, and other Parts of the Town put some of them to the Sword, which causing a great Tumult the whole City rose up in Arms, to the great Terror of the Pontiff, which was succeeded by no less Indignation at the little Reverence and Respect paid to his Authority.

BUT in the Midst of all these Doubts and extream Anxiety of Mind, his Holiness was seasonably relieved by Encouragements and Offers from the Venetians, who, being equally affected with the same Teror, endeavoured, with the most earnest Instances, to perswade him to join with them in sending immediately for Ten Thousand Swiss into Italy, and enlist a large Body of Italians to make a Resistance against so great a Danger; promising at the same time, according to their Custom, to do, for their Part, much more than they intended to perform. They represented
to

A. D. to the Pontiff that the German Foot ^{1525.} who assisted at the Defence of Pavia had not for several Months received their Pay, and finding after the Victory the same Difficulties in their Payments had made a Mutiny, and seizing on the Artillery had fortified themselves in Pavia: That on the same account all the rest of Cæsar's Army were become tumultuous, and would grow so more and more every Day, the Commanders not being able to pay them: That on these Grounds, if his Holiness joined with their Republic in making a powerful Armament, if they mutually put their Dominions in a State of Defence, and improved the Opportunity, the Imperialists, involved in those Difficulties, and under a Necessity of constantly keeping a large Body of Forces as a Guard on their Royal Prisoner, would fall into Disorders of themselves. Besides it was not to be doubted but that the Princess Regent in whom the whole Power of the French Government resided, ardently desirous of such a Conjunction, would,

would, at their Request, not only order A. D. the Duke of Albany immediately to ^{1525.} hasten to their Assistance with his own Troops, and the Four Hundred Lances of the Rear, who had retired from the Battle, and saved themselves, but would, with the Concurrence of the whole French Nation, contribute large Sums of Money for the Safety of Italy, as knowing that on this Liberality depended, in a great measure, the Hopes of recovering her Son: That this Resolution was certainly the best if taken speedily, but Delay might enable Cæsar to remedy the Disorders in his Army, and so much the more as any Potentate who did not retolve to put himself in Arms would be under a Necessity of compounding with, and furnishing him with Money, and consequently be himself the Instrument of freeing him from all his Difficulties, and establishing himself in a State of perpetual Subjection. They also gave him Hopes that their Example would be followed by the Duke of Ferrara, who, both on account of his antient Depend-

cies

A. D.

1525.

cies on the French, and the Assistance he had given the King in that War, was not without very great Apprehensions : And his Conjunction appeared of no small Importance, on account of the great Conveniency of his State in the Wars of Lombardy, and because the City of Ferrara was very strong, and extreamly well stored with Ammunition and Artillery, and, as it was reported, very rich in Money.

NEITHER the Hopes of coming off victorious in so difficult an Enterprize, nor the Consideration of Danger at a considerable Distance, for which Time often produces Remedies unthought of, would have inclined Clement to give Ear to these Arguments, if the Fears of a present Attack had not induced him to chuse rather to expose himself to a less certain Danger, than to a Danger which appeared greater and more present. The Negotiations therefore were so long carried on between them, till there remained nothing to do but only to draw up the Articles in Writing, Writing, it was expected every Hour A. D. that a Convention would be settled; ^{1525.} so that the Pope, looking upon the Treaty as concluded, posted away Girolamo Ghinuccio of Siena, Auditor of the Apostolic Chamber, to the King of England, to use all his Dexterity for persuading him to oppose the exorbitant Greatness of Cæsar, when opportunely arrived the Archbishop of Capua, his antient Secretary and Counsellor, who had for many Years been of great Authority with him.

THIS Prelate, as soon as he had heard of the Victory of the Imperialists, had set out for the Camp, to wait on Don Carlo di Lanoia, Viceroy of Naples, and having informed himself of his Intentions, immediately rode Post to the Pontiff, carrying with him certain Hopes of an Agreement. For the Viceroy and the other Generals had at that Time two Things that employed their Thoughts; one was, to provide Money for satisfying the Army, at which they were in very great Confusion, for the other was, to conduct the Person of the King of France to a Place where the Difficulty of guarding him would not keep them in continual Uneasiness ; and these two Points being well settled they imagined that Affairs would be in such a Situation as to put it in their Power always to accomplish their Designs. Wherefore they desired an Accommodation with the Pope, proposing to draw out of him a large Sum of Money ; and to dispose him to a more ready Compliance by putting him in a Consternation, and to ease the Dutchy of Milan, which was much exhausted, of the Burden of quartering Soldiers, they had sent Four Hundred Men at Arms and Eight Thousand Germans to take up their Quarters in the Piacentine, not as Enemies, but sometimes pretending that the Dutchy of Milan could not maintain so great a Number of Troops, and sometimes threatening to make them pass into the Territory of Rome, in order to find out the Duke of Albany, if the Troops levied

A. D. Want of Money to pay the Soldiers ;

1525.

by

by the Orsini were not disbanded. But A. D.
1525.
 these Pains were needless ; for as soon as the Pope was satisfied that it lay in his own Power to avoid the present Dangers, he laid aside all other Thoughts, and applied himself with all his Mind to find Means for an Agreement. Wherefore as soon as he had heard the Archbishop he sent to stop the Auditor of the Chamber on the Road, and to remove all Occasions that might obstruct an Accommodation, he procured that the Duke of Albany should disband all his Forces, except the Cavalry and Ultramontane Foot, and appointed him Quarters at Corneto, receiving a Promise of the Cæsarean Ministers that they would also disband their Troops which were about Rome, and put a Stop to Ascanio Colonna, and other Troops that were coming from the Kingdom of Naples ; and he interposed also his Mediation that the Colonnas, who had begun to molest the Territories of the Orsini, should desist from Hostilities.

A. D.

1525.

THE Pontiff was desirous, and used all his Endeavours that the Venetians might be included in the Convention of which he was treating with the Viceroy : But the Difficulty lay in their refusing to pay the Money demanded of them by the Viceroy, for he required as much Money as they would have spent in the War to which they were to contribute, and that, for the future, they should contribute their Share not in Men but in Money. He made also the same Demand of all those who were comprehended in the Confederacy contracted with Adrian. But this Obstinacy of the Venetians was of Service to the Pontiff, by giving Suspicion to the Viceroy that they were projecting new Movements.

WHILE these Affairs were under Negotiation, with the surest Prospect of bringing them to a Conclusion, the Florentines, by order of the Pontiff, sent the Marquis of Pescara Twenty-five Thousand Ducats for the Use of the Army, having first received a Promise from Giovan van Bartolomeo da Gattinara, deputed by ^{A. D.} the Viceroy to manage the Treaty at his ^{1525.} Court, that this Sum should be reckoned as Part of a larger Sum which they were to pay by Virtue of the new Capitulation. But, a very few Days before this Treaty was concluded, the Duke of Albany, who had waited for the Fleet to carry him back into France, the same being arrived at Porto di Santo Stefano, and the Gallies sent to fetch him off, embarked on board these and the Pope's Gallies lent him by Consent of the Viceroy, tho' no Pass had been granted either to the Fleet or to the Gallies. With the Duke embarked Renzo da Ceri, with the Artillery received from Siena and Lucca, and Four Hundred Horse, and One Thousand German Foot, but with a few Italians, the rest of the Troops being disbanded, and the Remainder of the Horses, partly sold off, and partly left behind. From the whole Progress of this Expedition it was easy to comprehend that the Duke of Albany was sent either with a View to oblige the Imperialists, out of Appre-

P 3 henensions

A. D. 1525. henfions for the Kingdom of Naples, to quit the Dutchy of Milan, in order to succour it, or that the same Fears should induce them to an Accommodation : And these were the Reasons of the Duke's slow Proceedings, the King wanting Forces to send him with a powerful Army.

BUT at last, on the first Day of April, a Confederacy, in which the Venetians were left out, was concluded at Rome, between the Pontiff and the Viceroy of Naples, as Cæsar's Lieutenant General in Italy, for whom acted as his Plenipotentiary Giovanni Bartolomeo da Gattinara, Grandson to Cæsar's Great Chancellor, comprehending the Pontiff himself and the Florentines on one Side, and Cæsar on the other. The Substance of the most important Articles was : That between the Pope and Cæsar there should be a perpetual Friendship and Confederacy, by which each Party shall be obliged to defend with a certain Number of Troops the Dutchy of Milan, at that Time possessed, under the Protection

tion of Cæsar, by Francesco Sforza, who was nominated as Principal in this Capitulation ; and that the Emperor should take under his Protection the whole State of the Church, and that which was in the Possession of the Florentines, and particularly the House of the Medici, with the Authority and Prerogative which it enjoys in that City ; paying him on that account at present One Hundred Thousand Ducats, as an Equivalent for what they ought to have contributed in the last War, by Virtue of the League made with Adrian, which was pretended not to expire with his Death, it being specified in the Articles that it should subsist for one Year after the Death of any one of the Confederates : That the Cæsarean Generals should recal their Troops from the Ecclesiastic State, and not send others to take up their Quarters in the same without the Pontiff's Consent. The Venetians were allowed the Term of Twenty Days for entering into their Confederacy on honourable Conditions, which were to be declared by the Pope and Cæsar : That the Viceroy should be

A. D.

1525.

^{A. D.}
^{1525.} bound to procure Cæſar's Ratification of all theſe Articles to be returned within Four Months. And the Deputies of the Viceroy obliged themſelves by a ſeparate Article, confirmed by an Oath, that, if Cæſar ſhould not ratify this Capitulation within the Term above-mentioned, the Viceroy ſhould repay the One Hundred Thouſand Ducats, the League however, till the Failure of ſuch Repayment, to remain inviolable. To this Convention were added Three Articles, not connected to the Capitulation but drawn in a ſeparate Writing, and confirmed alſo by Oath, containing, that, in Matters relating to Benefices in the Kingdom of Naples, it ſhould be permitted the Pontiff to exerciſe that Authority and Jurisdiction which were ordered by the Inveſtitures of the Kingdom: That the Dutchy of Milan, for the future, ſhould take its Salt from the Salt-pits of Cervia, at the ſame Price, and under the ſame Regulations as had been formerly agreed on between Leo and the preſent King of France, and confirmed by the Capitulation lation made by the same Leo, in the Year A. D.

 1521, with the Emperor: That the ^{1525.} Viceroy should be obliged to operate in such a Manner that the Duke of Fer- rara should immediately restore to the Church Reggio, Rubiera, and the other Towns which he had taken during the Vacancy of the Roman See by the Death of Adrian *: That in Consideration hereof the Pontiff, as soon as he should be put into intire Possession of those Towns, should pay unto Cæsar One Hundred Thousand Ducats, and, whenever he should be required by him, absolve the Duke from those Censures and Privations which he had incurred, though not however from the Penalty of One Hundred Thousand Ducats in which he was engaged in case he contravened the Covenant made with Adrian: Provided however, that, as soon as the Pope had recovered Possession, it should be submitted to Examination whether these

* In this Affair the Viceroy was guilty of a notorious Piece of Fraud and Double-Dealing, for at the same time he agreed with the Duke, and received Money of him, that these Towns should not be restored to the Pontiff.

A. D. these Towns, with Modena, belonged to 1525. the Empire; if to the Empire they should be held in Fee from Cæsar; but if they appertained to the Church, the Apostolic See was to remain in free Possession.

THIS Step of the Pope was variously interpreted by the Public according to the Difference of Passions and Judgments; the Multitude especially, who are usually better pleased with specious than mature Counsels, and often take those for generous who make a wrong Estimate of Things, and also all those who make a Profession of desiring the Liberty of Italy, blamed him as if, out of Meanness of Spirit, he had neglected the Opportunity of uniting the Italians against Cæsar, and had assisted with his own Money the Imperial Army to free themselves from all their Difficulties and Disorders. But most of the wiser Sort of People were of a very different Opinion; for they considered that a Resolution to make Resistance, with new-raised Troops, against a very numerous numerous and victorious Army, was by A. D. no means prudent : That the Arrival of ^{1525.} the Swiss could not but take up a long Time, whence it might easily happen for an Opportunity to be lost were they never so ready to hasten their Coming, of which, however, considering their Nature, and the Blow they had so lately received, there was no Certainty. Nor could any Thing better be expected from the Kingdom of France, where so great an Overthrow had left neither Courage nor Counsel, and where was no ready Provision of Money, or Men at Arms, of whom those few who had saved themselves in the Day of Battle, having lost their Baggage, wanted Time and Money to put themselves in new Equipages. This Union * therefore had no other probable Foundation than the Hopes that the hostile Army would not be able to put themselves in Motion for Want of their Pay. But tho' this should be the Case, they

* Of the States of Italy against Cæsar, the Neglect of which is above imputed to the Pope.

A. D. they would not by that Means be deprived of the Dutchy of Milan, which, as long as it was governed under Cæsar's Direction, would always give the Pope very just Reasons for Apprehensions. But this Hope was also very uncertain ; for it was to be feared that the Cæsarean Generals by their Authority and Policy, and by proposing the Pillage of some rich City of the Church, or of Tuscany, might dispose the Soldiers to march, as we find already that a Part of the Germans, only for the Sake of better Quarters, have passed the River Po, and spread themselves over the Territories of Parma and Piacenza, so that, if they had been resolved to have passed forwards, there could have been no Remedy but what would have come too late ; and a Resolution of such Importance, in so imminent a Danger, must have been founded only on the Hopes of Disorders among the Enemy, from which it finally depended on their own Will to disentangle themselves. The Counsel of Clement therefore, with respect to the current Times, was prudent and well considered ;
but

but it would perhaps have been more ^{A. D.} commendable, if he had used the same ^{1525.} Prudence in all the Articles of the Capitulation, and had turned his Thoughts rather on healing the Wounds of Italy, than on opening and exasperating some of the most virulent Kind, in Imitation of those knowing Physicians, who, when the Remedies administered to cure the Indisposition of the other Members increase the Disorders of the Head or Heart, laying aside all Care of slighter Evils, which well wait Time, attend with all Diligence to that which is of most Importance, and most necessary to the Health of the Patient. For the better understanding of this Point it is necessary to go pretty far back, and repeat Part of those Things already, tho' in a scattering Manner, related, and reduce them to one Plan and View.

THE House of Este, besides having for a very long Time, under the Title of Vicars of the Church, held the Government

A. D. vernment of Ferrara, were a long while 1525. in Possession of Reggio and Modena by the Investitures of the Emperors, there being no Question at that Time but that these two Cities were under the Imperial Jurisdiction, and possessed them in Peace, till Julius II. the Reviver of the almost antiquated Rights of the Apostolic See, and the Author of much Mischief under a pious Title, in order totally to reduce Ferrara under the Dominion of the Church, made War upon Duke Alfonso.
 In this War, having met with an Opportunity of wresting from the Duke Modena, he kept it at first for himself, as a Place which, together with other Towns as far as the River Po, appertained to the Apostolic See, as being Part of the Exarchate of Ravenna; but a little after, being under Fear of the French, he gave it up to the Emperor Maximilian. Nor did this put a Stop to the War against Alfonso; for Julius, not long after, took from him also Reggio, and it was believed that, if he had lived longer, he would have also taken Ferrara, being a most bitter Enemy to Alfonso, as well out of a pious Intention, with which he cloaked his Ambition of recovering to the Church whatever was said to have at any Time belonged to it, as from Indignation, because the Duke had preferred the Friendship of the French to that of his Holiness; and perhaps also from an implacable Hatred which he bore to the Memory and Reliques of Alexander VI. his Predecessor, whose Daughter Lucre- tia was married to Alfonso, and had several Children the Fruits of that Matrimony. Julius dying left to his Successors not only the Inheritance of Reggio, but the same Ambition of recovering Fer- rara, to which they were stimulated by the glorious Memory which he seemed to have left of himself to Posterity. Wherefore this Ambition was more prevalent in his Successor Leo, than his Regard to the Greatness of the House of the Medici in Florence, to which it appeared more conducive that the Power of the Church should be diminished, than by an Addition of Ferrara to make it more

A. D. more formidable to all its Neighbours.

^{1525.} On the contrary Leo having purchased Modena bent all his Thoughts on making himself Master of Ferrara, but more by Plots and Treachery than by open Force, which was become too difficult, because Alfonso seeing himself in such great Danger had employed himself in making his City very strong, had cast a great Number of Cannon, and provided vast Magazines of warlike Stores, and, as it was believed, very large Sums of Money. And Leo's Enmity was perhaps greater, but managed with more Secrecy, than that of Julius; for, besides a Multitude of Plots by which he several Times attempted to take the Place by Surprise or by Fraud, he brought those Princes with whom he contracted Alliances under an Obligation that at least they would give no Obstruction to this Enterprize. Nor did he only continue this Design in the Life time of his Brother Giuliano, and of his Nephew Lorenzo, for whose Exaltation it was believed that he had entertained this ambitious Desire, but was no

no less eager in pursuing it after their A. D. Deaths. And this Desire was so ardent ^{1525.} in him, that many are persuaded that he was hurried on his last rather precipitous than prudent Resolution of joining with Cæsar against the King of France, in a great measure, by the same Passion; so that Alfonso, to satisfy the King of France, his only Foundation and Hope, was necessitated to enter on a War in the Modenese, while the Army of Leo and Cæsar laid Siege to Parma. And the Duke, meeting with ill Success in this War, would soon have been reduced to very great Straits, had not Leo, about this Time, been taken off by a sudden Death, in the Course of his Victories; a Death certainly no less seasonable for Alfonso than that of Julius.

NOR am I satisfied that his Successor Adrian was not possessed of the same covetous Desire, though, being new and unexperienced in the Affairs of Italy, he had, in the first Month after his Arrival at Rome, absolved the Duke from Cen-

VOL. VIII. Q fures,

A. D. 1525. fures, granted him the Investiture anew, and permitted him to enjoy all that he had seized during the Vacations of the Church, and had given him Hopes of restoring to him Modena and Reggio; but, afterwards, upon better Information, he grew every Day more averse to such Restoration. But by the Creation of Clement the Duke came under very great Apprehensions that old Times were returning: And indeed justly; for this Pope, had Things succeeded prosperously with him, would have been in the same Disposition with Julius and Leo. But not meeting as yet an Opportunity to attempt Ferrara, he was intent on recovering Reggio and Rubiera, as more feasible, and the more justifiable because they had been so lately in the Possession of the Church, and on that account would reflect no small Dishonour on him if they were not recovered. Hence arose that Sollicitude in him, which discovered itself many other Ways before, and lastly in the Convention with the Viceroy, when he shewed himself more mindful of that that Affair than was desired by many, ^{A. D.} who knowing the Dangers impending on ^{1525.} all from the Greatness of Cæsar, and that no Preservative against it was more effectual than a hearty, sincere, and ready Union of Italy, and that they had Reason to expect every Day either Occasion or a Necessity of taking up Arms, were of Opinion that it would have been better for the Pontiff not to exasperate the Duke of Ferrara, and force him to throw himself into the Arms of the Emperor, considering that he was a Prince whose Friendship, on account of his Riches, the Conveniency of his Situation, and his other Conditions, was at that Juncture highly to be valued, and that he ought rather to have embraced a Reconciliation with him, and done his utmost for extirpating his Fears and Hatred, supposing however that doing a Kindness to one who is persuaded that he has received so many Injuries, is sufficient to cancel in ill-disposed and rancorous Minds the Memory of Offences, especially when the Favour is bestowed at a Time when it

A. D. appears to proceed rather from Necessity 1525. than good Will.

THE Capitulation being concluded, the Pontiff, not to be wanting in the suitable Offices due to so great a Prince, with the Viceroy's Permission, sent the Bishop of Pistoja to visit and comfort the King of France. The King, after some general Discourse in the Presence of General Alarcone, and intreating that the Pontiff would use his good Offices with Cæsar in his Behalf, asked the Bishop, in a low Voice, what was become of the Duke of Albany, and receiving for Answer that Part of his Troops was broken, and that he himself, with the rest, had passed into France, he was extremely concerned.

Several of the States of Italy capitulate with the Viceroy, AT this Time the Lucchese agreed with the Viceroy to pay Ten Thousand Ducats, for which he received them under Cæsar's Protection. The Senese also made an Agreement to pay Fifteen Thousand Ducats, without obliging the Viceroy to favour one Form of Government Government more than another : For A. D. on one Side those of the Monte de' Nove, ^{1525.} who, at the Instances of the Pontiff, by means of the Duke of Albany, had resumed, tho' not as yet consolidated, their Authority ; and on the other hand those who, for their Profession of aspiring after Liberty, were commonly called Libertines, and much animated, by the Battle of Pavia, to make Head against the Government introduced by the Forces of the King of France, had each Party sent their Agents to the Viceroy to render him propitious to their Designs ; but, obtaining from him no certain Resolution concerning their Form of Government, had all readily joined in soliciting a Composition. This being made, and the Men, sent by the Viceroy to receive the Money, being arrived, while the Money was telling, and in their Presence, Girolamo Severini, a Senese Citizen, who had been some Time with the Viceroy, assassinated Alessandria Bichi, the Head Bichi as-of the new Government, and the Person assassinated. in whom the Pope had designed that, for

A. D. the present, the whole Authority should 1525. center. On this Occasion others of the Change of Government in Siena. Citizens concerned with Severini in the Conspiracy taking up Arms, in Conjunction with the Populace, who were discontented under the Apprehensions that the Government had reverted to a Tyranny, expelled the Chiefs of the Monte de' Nove, and new modelled the Government, putting it in the Hands of the People, who were Enemies to the Pontiff, and Adherents to Cæsar. These Proceedings were not, as it is thought, without the Knowledge of the Viceroy, or at least his highest Approbation of what had been done, considering of what mighty Convenience it was for Cæsar's Affairs to have at his Devotion that potent City, which has the Advantage of Sea-ports and a fertile Territory, is near the Kingdom of Naples, and is situated between Rome and Florence, though the Viceroy and the Duke of Sessa had given Hopes to the Pontiff that no Alteration should be made in a Government introduced with his Favour.

MANY others of the Italian Powers followed the Inclination of the above-mentioned, and the Fortune of the Conqueror: among whom the Marquis of Monferrato compounded for Fifteen Thousand Ducats, and the Duke of Ferrara, who could not so readily settle his Affairs on account of the Relation which they had to the Capitulation made with the Pontiff, and because it was necessary first to be assured of Cæsar's Intentions, was content to lend the Viceroy Fifty Thousand Ducats with a Promise of Repayment unless they otherwise agreed. With this Money, and One Hundred Thousand Ducats, promised them by the State of Milan, and the Sums for which the Genoesè and Lucchese stood engaged, together with the Money remitted by Cæsar to Genoa for the Support of the War, but which did not arrive till after the Victory, the Generals employed themselves, as fast as it came, in paying the Arrears due to the Army, sending back from

A. D. Time to Time, as they were paid, the 1525. Germans into their own Country,

As no Signs therefore appeared that they intended for the present to follow the Course of their Victory against any one, but that, on the contrary, the Viceroy had ratified the Capitulation made with the Pontiff, and was at the same time treating of making a new Appointment with the Venetians, which he eagerly desired, the Eyes of all People were turned upon Cæsar, to behold in what Manner he would receive the joyful News of the Victory, and to what End he would direct his Thoughts. In that Prince, as far as could be comprehended by outward Demonstrations, appeared Marks of a Mind full of Moderation, qualified easily to resist the Prosperity of Fortune*, and such as could hardly be believed in a Prince so powerful, young, and one who had never seen any

* He ordered a Procession and Supplications for three Days, that this great Success might turn out to the Welfare and Advantage of all Christendom. Giovio.

any other than happy Success. For on A. D.
 Advice of so great a Victory, which he ^{1525.} received on the Tenth Day of March, together with a Letter from the King of France, written with his own Hand in a supplicant Manner, and more with the Spirit of a Prisoner than of a King, he immediately went to Church to render Thanks to God, with all Solemnity, for so great Success; and the next Morning, with Marks of the highest Devotion, received the Sacrament of the Eucharist, and went in Procession to the Church of our Lady, without Madrid, where he resided at that Time with his Court. Nor did he consent, as is customary with others, that there should be any Demonstrations of rejoicing by Balls or Bonfires, or in any other Manner, saying, that it was proper to make Re-joycings for Victories obtained over Infidels, and not for such as are gotten over Christians. And without shewing, either in his Words or Gestures, any Sign of immoderate Gladness, or of being puffed up in Mind, he answered the Congratulations

A. D. 1525. tions of Ambassadors and of the Grandees who were near his Person, that he was pleased with the Victory, because the Assistance of God, manifestly vouchsafed to him on that Occasion, appeared to him as a Sign that he was, tho' unworthy, in his Favour; and because he hoped that now he should have an Opportunity of giving Peace to Christendom, and of preparing War against the Infidels, and should also be the better enabled to be kind to his Friends, and to pardon his Enemies; adding that, tho' that Victory might justly be accounted all his own, since none of his Friends had assisted him in obtaining it, yet he was willing that it should be common to all. To this Purpose, after he had given Audience to the Venetian Ambassador, who justified the Steps taken by his Republic, he said to the Attendants that his Excuses were not true, however he would accept of them as such. After some Days had passed in a Continuation of such like Speeches and outward Demeanor, indicating the highest Wisdom and Goodness, in order to proceed with Maturity, according to his Custom, one Day he called a Council, and signified to them that he desired their Advice how to regulate his Conduct with regard to the King of France, and what Ends he ought to serve by this Victory; commanding every one to give his Advice with Freedom in his Presence. In consequence of this Command, the Bishop of Osma, who held the Office of Confessor to Cæsar, made the following Speech :
to

THE WARS IN ITALY. 251

“ THOUGH we are assured, most glorious Prince, that whatever happens in this lower World proceeds from the Providence of the Supreme Being, which daily gives Motion to Causes, and regulates Events, on some Occasions discovering its Operations in an extraordinary Manner, yet never did it give more evident Tokens of its intervening Power than in the present Victory : A Victory, which on account of its Greatness, the Ease with which it was obtained, and the great Power of the Enemies, who abounded with all the necessary Provisions of War

A. D.

1525.

The Speech of the Bishop of Osma to Charles V.

A. D. War to a far greater Degree than ourselves, 1525.

every one must own to have been by the express Will of God, and almost miraculous. The greater therefore and more manifest the Favour of Heaven has appeared in this Event, the more strictly is your Majesty obliged to acknowledge it, and to shew all the Marks of a just Gratitude. This Behaviour consists principally in the Direction and Improvement of the Victory in such a Manner as may best promote the Service of God, and answer those Ends for which we may believe it has been granted. And indeed when I consider to what a low Ebb the State of Christendom is reduced, I cannot see that any Thing can be more holy, more necessary, or more pleasing to God, than an universal Peace between Christian Princes, without which we must be sensible that Religion, the Catholic Faith, and a good Life must fall under most manifest Decay and Disrepute. On one Side we have the Turks, who, taking Advantage of our Divisions, have made an amazing Progress, and now threaten Hungary, the Kingdom of your Sister's Husband.

band. And if they should get Possession A. D. of Hungary, as no doubt they will if the ^{1525.} Christian Princes are not reconciled, they will have an open Road into Germany and Italy. On the other Side this Lu- theran Heresy, so hateful to God, so re-proachful to him who has Power to suppress it, and so dangerous to all Princes, has now gained such a Footing, that without due Care it will fill the World with Heretics, and no Provision can be made against it but by the Imperial Power and Authority, which, while your Majesty is involved in other Wars, cannot exert themselves for the Extirpation of this most pernicious Poison. But besides all this, had we nothing to apprehend either from Turks or Heretics, what can be more unseemly, more wicked, and more pestiferous, than that so much Christian Blood, which might be gloriously spent for propagating the Christian Faith, or at least reserved for more necessary Occasions, should be idly spilt for the Gratification of our Passions, attended with so many Rapes, Sacrileges, and horrible Outrages? Evils, of which who-

A. D. whoever is willingly the Author can never 1525. hope for Pardon from God, and which whoever commits out of Necessity, deserves no Excuse if he has not at least a full Intention to redress them as soon as it shall lie in his Power. The End therefore which you are to have in View, ought to be universal Peace among Christians, a Work above all others honourable, holy, and necessary, and which we are now to consider by what Means it may be accomplished. There are three Resolutions which lie at your Majesty's Choice concerning the King of France; one of keeping him a perpetual Prisoner; another of setting him at Liberty with Marks of Affection, and in a brotherly Manner, without any other Conditions than such as may serve to establish a perpetual Peace and Friendship between your Majesty and him, and to heal the Sores of Christendom. A Third Way is to give him his Liberty, but with Care to make all the Profit of it that may be possible. Of these Resolutions the first and last, if I mistake not, prolong and increase the Wars. A loving and brotherly ly Dismission is the only Way to extir- A. D. pate them for ever. For who can doubt, ^{1525.} that the King of France, quite charmed by such generous Treatment, and singular Liberality, from the Sense of so extraordinary a Benefit, will be more bound in Mind, and more in your Power, than he is at present in Body? And if a sincere Union and Harmony should happily be effected between your Majesty and that King, all the rest of Christendom will betake themselves to follow that Road which shall be marked out for them by two such Princes. But a Resolution to keep the King in perpetual Custody, besides incurring the too just Imputation of Cruelty, and discovering a Mind ignorant and insensible of Fortune, is the ready Way to propagate Wars without End, since it presupposes an Intention to conquer all or a great Part of France, which is impossible to be accomplished without new and very destructive Wars.

 If we chuse the Mean between these two Resolutions, which is to set the Royal Prisoner at Liberty, but on such Conditions

A. D: tions as to yield us all the Profit that 1525.  can be possibly be made of it, it is, in my Opinion, more perplexed, and more dangerous than both the others. For whatever Affinity he may contract, whatever Articles or Obligations he may consent to sign, he will always remain an Enemy, and he will never want the Assistance of all those who are jealous of your Majesty's Greatness, whence may be expected new Wars, and those more bloody and more dangerous than the past. I am sensible how much this Opinion differs from the general Sentiment, that it is quite new and without Precedent; but these singular and extraordinary Resolutions may very well become Cæsar, nor is it at all surprising that his Largeness of Soul is very capable of such Notions as are above the Comprehension of all other Men, whom he ought to excel in Magnanimity as much as he is advanced above them in Dignity; and therefore he ought to know, above all others, how full of Glory an Act of such great Generosity would appear, and ^{A. D.} how much it is the Duty of Cæsar to ^{1525.} pardon and shew Kindness rather than to make Conquests: That God has not in vain almost miraculously put into his Hands the Power of giving Peace to the World; that it is incumbent on him, after so many Victories, after so many Favours bestowed upon him by the Almighty, after seeing all his Enemies prostrate at his Feet, to proceed no longer as an Enemy to any Person whatever, but to provide, as a common Father, for the Welfare of all. The Names of Alexander the Great and Julius Cæsar were rendered more glorious by the Magnanimity of pardoning Enemies, and restoring Kingdoms to the Conquered, than by the Multitude of Victories and Triumphs. Their Example deserves the more to be followed by him who, not proposing to himself, for his sole End, Glory, tho' a very great Reward, principally desires to discharge the true and proper Office that belongs to every Christian Prince. But to come closer to the Point, in order to convince those who estimate human Affairs by human Ends, let us consider what Resolution is looked upon to be the most serviceable to those very Ends. I verily think that of all your Majesty's Greatness, there is no Part more marvellous, more worthy, than the Glory you have attained of being hitherto invincible, and of conducting all your Enterprises to a most happy Issue with so much Reputation and Prosperity. This is without Doubt the most precious Jewel, the most singular Treasure among all your Treasures. How then can it be better secured, or more certainly be preserved than by closing the War with so generous and magnanimous an End, by putting the Glory acquired out of the Power of Fortune, and bringing this Ship, laden with Wares of inestimable Value, out of the wide Ocean into a safe Harbour? But let us insist farther; is not that Greatness which is preserved by Free Will more desirable than that which is maintained by Violence? None doubts it, because it is more stable, more easy, more pleasing, and more honourable.
 such

A. D.
1525.

honourable. If Cæsar obliges the King ^{A. D. 1525.} of France by so signal an Act of Liberty, by so inestimable a Benefit, will not that King always be as a Guardian of him, and of his Kingdom? If he gives so manifest an Assurance to the Pope and to the other Princes, that he contents himself with the States which he has in Possession, and has no Thoughts but how to promote the universal Welfare of Christendom, will they not be satisfied, and renounce all Fears and Jealousies? And when they have no farther Grounds for Apprehensions or Disputes, they will not only love but adore such transcendent Goodness. Thus, with the voluntary Submission of all, will he give Laws to all, and have it infinitely more in his Power to dispose of Christians by Benevolence and Authority than by Force and Imperiousness. Assisted then and followed by all, he will be enabled to turn his Arms against the Lutherans and Infidels with more Glory, and with more Opportunities of making greater Conquests, which I see no Reason why we should not as well desire to be

A. D. made in Africa, or in Greece, or in the 1525. Levant, even tho' the Enlargement of Dominion among Christians were attended with so much Facility as many, in my Opinion, vainly, imagine : For the Power of your Majesty is so greatly augmented as to become too formidable to every one, and if they should perceive that it is designed to be carried to a greater Height, they will all unite against you.
 The Pope dreads your Power, the Vene- tians are under Apprehensions from it, all Italy stands in Awe of it, and, if we may judge by outward and frequent Signs, the King of England begins to take Umbrage at its Progress. The French may possibly be for some Months amused with Hopes and fruitless Negotiations, but at last it will be necessary to deliver their King, or they will be thrown into Despair, and when desperate they will join with all the rest of your Adversaries.
 If the King be set at Liberty on Conditions of little Advantage to your Majesty, where will be the Gain by losing the Opportunity of exercising such extraordinary Magnanimity, which, if not exerted
 at

at this Beginning, when you would afterwards seek to display it, will carry with it neither Praise nor Glory, nor the like Grace? If you set him free on Conditions very advantageous and profitable to yourself, he will not observe them; for no Security that he may give can be of such Importance to him, but that he will be much more concerned to prevent his Enemy from becoming so great, as afterwards to have it in his Power to oppress him. Thus shall we have either a useless Peace, or a dangerous War, the Issues of which are uncertain. Whoever has enjoyed a long State of Felicity has the greater Reason to dread the Change of Fortune, and he who once had it in his Power to settle all his Affairs on a good Foundation, feels the bitterest Regret when Things fall out contrary to the Hopes with which he had flattered himself. I trust, Cæsar, that I have satisfied your Command, if not with Prudence, yet at least with Affection and Fidelity; and now nothing remains on my Part, but to pray God to give you a Mind and

R 3 Ability

A. D. 1525. Ability to take such a Resolution as may be most agreeable to his Will, and most conducive to the Advancement of your own Glory, and finally best suited for promoting the Good of the Christian Commonwealth, of which, on account of the supreme Dignity in which you are placed, and because it is manifestly the Will of God, it is fit you should be Father and Protector."

CÆSAR heard this Counsel with great Attention, and without shewing any Sign of Displeasure or Approbation: But, after he had been a while silent, he made a Sign for others to speak; on which Federigo, Duke of Alva, a Person of great Authority in Cæsar's Court, made the following Speech:

Speech of the Duke of Alva to Charles Vth. " I SHALL hope to be excused, most invincible Emperor, if I should confess that, as for my Part, I have no Judgment different from the common Judgment, nor Capacity of carrying my Understanding to a higher Pitch than that to which which the ordinary Understandings of A. D. other Men have arrived ; and, what is ^{1525.} more, I shall perhaps be the more commended if I should advise you to take the same Steps, and proceed by the same Methods by which your Fathers and Grandfathers always proceeded. For new and strange Counsels may perhaps at first Sight appear more glorious and more magnanimous, but are sure to prove in the End more dangerous and more fallacious than those which have at all Times, and with all Men, been approved by Reason and Experience. The Will of God in the first Place, and, subordinate to that, the Valour of your Generals and Soldiers have given you a greater Victory than has been gained by any Christian Prince for these many Ages ; but all the Fruits of Success in Battles consists in making a right Use of the Victory, and not to do this is the more disgraceful than not to overcome, as it is a greater Fault to be cheated of those Things which are in the Power of him who suffers the Cheat to pass upon him, than of those which R 4 depend

A D. depend on Fortune. The more then ^{1525.} are we to beware of taking a Resolution which must in the End create us Shame before others, and Repentance in our own Breasts; and the more important the Affair is of which we treat, the more circumspectly are we to proceed, and to take with Maturity those Resolutions which once found erroneous can never afterwards be rectified; and you are to consider with yourselves that if the King be set at Liberty, he is immediately out of your Reach, but while he is a Prisoner it is always in your Power to release him. And he ought not to wonder at your Slowness, since, if I mistake not, he is conscious to himself in what Manner he would act if Cæsar were his Prisoner. The Capture of the King of France was certainly a very great Concern, but whoever well considers the Case will find his Dis-mission to be incomparably greater; nor can it ever be considered prudent to take a Resolution of such great Moment, without very long Consultation, and revolving the Case infinite Times
in

in the Mind. I should not perhaps be A. D. of this Opinion, {could I persuade my-^{1525.}self that the King, if he were at present set at Liberty, would acknowledge so great a Benefit with due Gratitude; and that the Pope and the other Italian Powers would lay aside their Covetousness and Ambition, together with their Jealousies. But who knows not how dangerous it is to found so important a Resolution on so fallacious and uncertain a Supposition? Since whoever well considers the Condition and Manners of Men will sooner judge the contrary. For nothing is in its own Nature more transitory, nothing of a shorter Date, than the Remembrance of Benefits, and the greater they are, the greater Measure of Ingratitude (according to the Proverb) is required to pay them. For he who is either unable or unwilling to cancel them by Recompensation, often strives to cancel them either by Forgetfulness, or by persuading himself that they are not so considerable; and he who is ashamed of having been reduced to a State that had need of Benefits,

A. D. ^{1525.} nefits, is besides galled at the Thoughts of having received them ; so that the Hatred arising from the Memory of the Necessity under which they were both fallen, operates more strongly in them than the Obligation presented from the Consideration of the Kindness that had been shewed them. Besides, what Nation is there to whom Insolence is more natural or Levity more proper, than to the French ? Now where there is Insolence there is Blindness, where there is Levity, there is no Knowledge of Virtue, no Judgment to qualify a Man for discerning the Actions of others, and no Gravity to enable him to estimate what is fit and proper for himself. What then can be expected from a King of France, puffed up with as much Pride as can be conceived in a King of Frenchmen, but that he burns with Rage and Indignation as being a Prisoner to Cæsar, at a Time when he thought himself sure of triumphing over him ? The Memory of his Disgrace will always be fresh in his Mind, and after he is at Liberty he will be so far from be-believing that the Way to obliterate it ^{A. D.} is by Gratitude, that he will be always ^{1525.} striving to get the Superiority over you. He will persuade himself that he is dismissed on account of the Difficulty of retaining him, not out of Goodness or Magnanimity. Such is the Nature of Men in general, but is always the Nature of Frenchmen, in whom whoever expects Gravity or Magnanimity must expect new Orders and Regulations in human Concerns. Thus, in the Room of Peace, and Re-establishment of Order and Harmony in the World, new Wars and Contentions will arise, greater and more dangerous than the past. For your Reputation will be lost, and your Army, which expects the due Fruits of so great a Victory, deceived in its Hopes, will no longer exert the same Valour and Vigour, nor will your Affairs be attended with the same Fortune, who will hardly stay with those that would retain her, much less with such as drive her away. Nor will the imaginary Goodness of the Pope and Venetians prove of any other Kind, but, on the con-

A. D. contrary, repenting of having suffered 1525. you to obtain the past Victory, they will do their utmost to prevent you from obtaining any more, and the Fear which they now have of you will prompt them to use all their Endeavours to prevent their falling again under new Fears; and thus, when it is in your Power to hold your Enemies bound with the Chains of Terror and Amazement, you yourself, out of a fond Excess of Goodness, will be the Instrument to free them from those Shackles that they might bid you Defiance.
What may be the Will of God in this Case I pretend not to know, nor do I believe it known to others, because we are usually taught that his Judgments are a deep Secret and unsearchable : But if we may venture to guess from such clear Appearances I imagine it favourable to your Greatness, and cannot suppose that he dispenses his Blessings to you in such an Abundance with a Design that you should cast them behind your Back, but in order to render you as much superior to others in Fact

Fact and Reality, as you are in Right A. D.
and Title. To lose therefore so fair an 1525.

Opportunity, which God has put into your Hands, is wilfully to render yourself unworthy of his Favours. Experience has always demonstrated, and Reason has made it appear, that Success never attends an Affair that depends on many Hands: I much question therefore whether he who imagines that the Heretics can be oppressed, or the Infidels subdued by the Union of many Princes, forms to himself just Notions of the Nature of Mankind. These are Enterprises that require a Prince of such Greatness as to dictate and give Directions to the others, without which all Treaties and Efforts for those Purposes will meet with the same Success for the future as they have had in Times past. For this End, I believe, God has opened you a Way to universal Monarchy, which alone is sufficient to answer these holy Intentions; and it is best to delay the Commencement of the Undertaking, in order to proceed on better and more certain Foundations. Nor suffer yourself
to

A. D. to be diverted from this Resolution by ^{1525.} the Fear of so many Confederates who threaten you, for the Opportunity is too great which you have in your Power : For if Matters be rightly negotiated the King's Mother, out of natural Tender-ness, and from a Necessity of recovering her Son, will never suffer herself to be cut off from all Hopes of getting him out of your Hands by an Agree-ment ; nor will the Princes of Italy ever unite with the Regency of France, knowing that it is always in your Power to break such an Union by delivering the King, and even to make it turn to their Disadvantage. They must of necessity remain in Suspense and Amaze-ment, and at last strive who shall be foremost in receiving Laws from your Imperial Majesty, for whom it will then be glorious to exercise Clemency and Magnanimity, when Affairs are reduced to such a Situation that they cannot help acknowledging you for their Superior. In such Cases did Alexander and Cæsar exercise these Virtues, freely pardoning Injuries, but were not so inconsiderate derate as voluntarily to involve themselves afresh in those Difficulties and Dangers which they had overcome. He who acts in this Manner deserves Praise because he has but few Examples, but that Man is not perhaps to be commended for his Prudence who does a Thing for which there is no Example. Wherefore, Cæsar, my Opinion is, that the greatest Profit be made of this Victory that is possible, and that with this View the King, always treated with the Honours suitable to Kings, be conducted, if it cannot be into Spain, at least to Naples; and that in Answer to his Letter you send him a Messenger with a very kind Message, who shall at the same Time propose the Conditions of his Liberty, which may be such as, when they come to be particularly examined, may appear to carry in them a Reward worthy of such a Victory. These Foundations and Ends of your Proceedings being thus settled, Time and Accidents which arise, according to their Nature, will either hasten or retard the King's Deliverance, and shew whether we are

A D. to have Peace or War with the Italians, 1525. } to whom at present it may be expedient to give Hopes, and to augment as much as possible the Favour and Reputation of our Arms by Art and Industry, that we might not every Day have occasion to tempt Fortune anew, and may be prepared for an Accommodation with this or that Power, or with all together, or with none, as Opportunity shall direct. These are the Methods which were always pursued by wise Princes, and particularly by those who were the Founders of so much Greatness; they never rejected the Means that offered themselves for their Promotion, nor slackened Sail before a prosperous Gale of Fortune. The same Duty is incumbent on you, to whom belongs in Justice what in some of them might appear Ambition. Remember, Cæsar, that you are a Prince, and that it is your Duty to proceed in the Way of Princes; and that no Person divine or human forbids you to embrace the Opportunity of reviving and restoring the usurped and oppressed Authority of the the Empire, but only obliges you to have an honest Mind and Intention in recovering them by lawful Means. And remember above all how easy it is to lose great Opportunities, and how difficult to acquire them, and therefore that it is necessary to strive with all Diligence to keep fast Hold of them while we may, and not lay our Strefs on the Goodness or Prudence of the Conquered, since the World is full of Imprudence and Malignity. Concluding then that the Christian Religion can rely on no other Means of Defence but from your Greatness, be not wanting to augment it with all your Might, not so much for the Interest of your own Glory and Authority, as for the Service of God, and out of Zeal for the universal Good."

It would be impossible to express the Satisfaction of the whole Council at this Speech of the Duke of Alva, every one having already proposed in his Mind the Empire of almost all Christendom; so that there was not a single Member of the Assembly, who did not confirm the same Opinion, without making any Re-

A. D. 1525. ply, Cæsar himself also approving it, tho' rather to shew that he was not willing to reject the Counsel of his Friends than by declaring what Part he was willing to take of himself. He dispatched away therefore Buren, a Gentleman of his Bedchamber, and his intimate and well-beloved Confident, to notify his Resolution to the Generals, and to visit, in his Name, the King of France, and propose the Conditions on which he might obtain his Liberty. Buren having performed his Journey by Land, because the King's Mother, for the more convenient Negotiation of her Son's Affairs, did not hinder the Passage of Couriers and other Persons that came to and from Cæsar, went, together with Bourbon and the Viceroy, to Pizzichitone, where the King as yet remained, and offered him his Liberty, but on such hard Conditions that the King heard them with a vast Deal of Uneasiness.

Condi- For, besides the Cession of the Rights tions of Li- which he pretended to have in Italy, berty pro- posed to Cæsar demanded of him the Restitution posed to the King of France. of the Dutchy of Burgundy as his Property ;

perty ; that he should bestow Provence A. D. 1525. on the Duke of Bourbon, with other Conditions for the King of England and for himself of very great Importance. To these Demands the King constantly answered, That he was re-His solved to die a Prisoner rather than de-Answer. prive his Children of any Part of the Kingdom of France ; and even if he should resolve otherwise it would not be in his Power to perform it, the an-tient Statutes of France not permitting the Alienation of any Thing belonging to the Crown without the Consent of the Parliaments, and of others in whom resided the Authority of the whole Kingdom, who were accustomed, in the like Cases, to prefer the universal Safety to the particular Interest of the Persons of Kings. Let them demand of him such Conditions as were possible for him to execute, and they would find him very readily disposed to enter into Engagements with Cæsar, and to favour his Greatness. Nor did he omit the Op-His portunity of proposing different Condi-Proposals. tions, making no Scruple of very large

A. D. Concessions out of the States of others, ^{1525.} that he might obtain his Liberty without any Obligation to diminish his own. As to the Substance of his Proposals, he offered to take in Marriage Cæsar's Sister, Widow of the late King of Portugal, with an Acknowledgment that he held Burgundy in Right of her Dowry, to which the Children born of that Matrimony should succeed : That he would restore to Bourbon his Dutchy, which had been confiscated, and make an Addition to it of some other States ; and in Recompence for Cæsar's Sister, who had been promised him, to give him his own Sister, just now become a Widow by the Death of Alençon ; to satisfy the King of England, and to pay a very large Sum to Cæsar for his Ransom ; to resign up to him his Rights to the Kingdom of Naples and Dutchy of Milan : To engage himself to accommodate him with a Fleet at Sea, and an Army by Land, whenever he should go to Rome to receive the Imperial Crown ; which was indeed the same as to promise to give him all Italy for a Prey.

Prey. With this Draught of Articles A. D.
Buren returned to Cæsar, accompanied ^{1525.} by Monf. Montmorency, a Person at that Time very agreeable to the King, who afterwards promoted him first to the Office of Great Master, and then to the Dignity of High Constable of France.

BUT when the News came to France ^{Conster-} of the Defeat of the Army, and of the ^{nation in} Captivity of the King, the Confusion ^{France} and Despair that seized all Ranks of ^{on the} People are beyond Imagination. For to ^{News of} the immense Grief which the lamenta- ^{the Defeat.} ble Misfortune of their King excited in a Nation naturally most affectionate and devoted to the Royal Name, was added an Infinity of public and private Sorrows : Of a private Kind, because there were few in the Court, and among the Nobility, who had not lost in Battle Sons, Brothers, or other Kindred, or choicest Friends ; and of a public Con-cernment, on account of so great a Diminution of the Authority and Splendor of so glorious a Kingdom : An Affliction the more grievous to them,

A. D. as they are by Nature arrogant and 1525. self-conceited, and because they were apprehensive that so great a Calamity was but the Beginning of worse Ruin, their King being taken Prisoner, and the Heads of the Government, and almost all the principal Officers of the Army being either taken with the King, or killed in the Battle, the Kingdom exhausted of Money, and surrounded with very potent Enemies : For the King of England, tho' he had entered into several Treaties, and seemed irresolute in many Things, yet a few Days before the Battle, breaking off all Negotiations with the King, had publicly declared that he would pass into France, if Affairs succeeded prosperously in Italy.
 Wherefore it was much to be feared that Cæsar and that King, having so fair an Opportunity, would commence a War in France, where, because there was no other Person at the Helm of Government than a Woman and the King's little Children, the eldest of whom was not full Eight Years old, and because they had with them the Duke of Bourbon,

Bourbon, a Lord of such great Power A. D. and Authority in the Kingdom of France, ^{1525.} every Movement which they might make must be very dangerous.

NOR was the King's Mother, under Conduct so much Care and Fatigue, out of Love of the La-to her Son, and a Regard to the Dan-^{dy Regent} gers of the Kingdom, without her own in France. proper Passions: For being ambitious, and most tenacious of Government, tho' she was apprehensive that, if the King's Deliverance should be protracted, and some new Difficulties should arise in France, she might be constrained to resign the Administration to those who should be commissioned by the States of the Kingdom, yet in the Midst of so much Concern and Preturbation, re-collecting her Spirits, and encouraging those who were about her, besides making Provisions as soon as possible for the Defence of the Frontiers of France, and for raising vast Sums of Money, as Lady Regent, by whose Order, and in whose Name all publick Business was dispatched, she wrote sup-plicatory

A. D. 1525. She follicits her Son's Liberty. plicatory Letters, full of moving Expressions tending to excite Compassion, by first introducing, and then, by Degrees, soliciting as much as she could a Treaty of Agreement. For this Purpose, a few Days after, she set at Liberty Don Ugo di Moncada, and sent him to Cæsar with Offers that her Son should renounce all Claims to the Kingdom of Naples and the State of Milan. That he was content to have the Title to Burgundy examined, and that if it was found to belong to Cæsar he would acknowledge it in the Name of his Sister's Dowry: That he would restore to Bourbon his State with his Moveables which were of very great Value, and the Profits of it which had been seized by the Royal Chamber *: That he would give him his Sister in Marriage, and consent that he should have Provence, if it should be judged that he had the better Right to it.

THAT these Negotiations might be the more facilitated, rather than with a Mind

* Or confiscated for the King's Use.

Mind bent on War, the Regentess immediately dispatched proper Persons to Italy, to recommend the Safety of her Son to the Pope and Venetians, offering, if, for their own Preservation, they would enter into a strict Alliance with her, and take up Arms against Cæsar, Five Hundred Lances, and a large Contribution of Money. But her principal Desire, and that of the whole Kingdom of France should have been to mitigate the Spirit of the King of England, judging, as it was true, that not having him for an Enemy the Kingdom of France was out of Danger of being molested. But if that King on one Quarter, and Cæsar on another should make an Attack upon them, they would find themselves involved in Difficulties and Dangers. But in a little Time the Regentess began to conceive some Hopes from that Side: For tho' the King of England, on the first News of the Victory, had shewed extraordinary Tokens of Rejoicing, and publicly declared that he designed to pass into France in Person, and had also sent Ambassadors

A. D. ^{1525.} baſſadors to Cæſar to treat, and ſolicit him to carry on a War in Conjunction, yet at the ſame Time, proceeding in the ſame Humour in which he had proceeded on other Occaſions, he requested alſo of Madam the Regentſs to ſend him over ſome proper Perſon. She immediately diſpatched a Perſon with a very ample Commiſſion, and a Charge to uſe all Submission and poſſible Arts to mitigate the Mind of that King.

Seeks Peace with England.

HENRY, directed wholly by the Counſels of the Cardinal of York, ſeemed to propoſe for his principal End the Cogniſance and Arbitration of the Differences between the other Princes, that all the World might know that the Deciſi-on of the main Point of Affairs of Moment depended on him. Wherefore at the ſame time he offered to Cæſar to paſs into France with a potent Army, and to put in Execution the Affairs which had ſome time ſince been agreed between them, and, to remove all Doubts, offered to conſign his Daughter, not yet of Years fit for Matrimony, to Cæſar's Charge

THE WARS IN ITALY. 283

Charge without Delay. But this Affair ^{A. D. 1525.} met with no small Obstruction, partly occasioned by himself, and partly proceeding from Cæsar, who was not so forward to agree with him as he had been in Times past. For that King demanded in a Manner all the Reward of the Victory for his own Share, as Picardy, Normandy, Guyenne, and Gascony, with the Title of the King of France, and that Cæsar, tho' the Rewards were unequal, should pass into France in Person, and bear an equal Share in the Costs and Danger. The Inequality of these Conditions shocked Cæsar, and much the more when he called to Mind that in the last Years, when France was in the greatest Danger, he had always slackened the Prosecution of the War against it: Whence he persuaded himself that no Strefs could be laid on such an Alliance, and that, as he was greatly exhausted of Money, and tired out with so many Fatigues and Dangers, he had Reason to hope for obtaining more of the King of France by Means of Peace, than with Force of Arms, by acting in

Con-

A. D. Conjunction with the King of England.

1525. Induced therefore by a Desire of having Children, and furnishing himself with Money, he had an Inclination to espouse the Sister of John King of Portugal, of an Age fit for Matrimony, with whom he expected to receive in Dowry a very large Sum of Money ; and considerable Contributions, in case the Match should take Effect were offered by his own People, who were desirous to have a Queen of the same Language and Nation, and who was likely to be soon a Mother.

FROM these Causes the Nogotiations between the two Princes meeting every Day with new Difficulties, to which must be added the Inclination which the Cardinal of York continually bore to the King of France, and the Complaints which he openly made of Cæsar, as well for the Interest of his King, as because he thought him beginning to fall into Contempt with Cæsar. For that Prince, before the Battle of Pavia, had never used to send him any Letters, but such as were written ten

ten all with his own Hand, and subscribed “Your Son and Cousin Charles,” ^{A. D. 1525.} but since that Victory he had sent him Letters in which was nothing written with his own Hand except the Subscription, which was no longer in Titles that betokened so much Reverence and Submission, but barely his own proper Name “Charles.” On these Accounts the King of England received the Person sent by Madam the Regentness with very kind Words, and Marks of Respect; and, encouraging her to hope well of future Events, not long after he totally abandoned Cæsar’s Interest, and entered into an Alliance with Madam, who contracted in the Name of her Son, in which he caused to be inserted an express Condition, that it should not be lawful to yield, even tho’ it were for the Deliverance of the King, any Thing that was at that Time belonging to the Kingdom of France.

Confederacy between France
and England.

THESE were the first Dawnings of Hope on the distressed Country of France, when she began to take Breath after her severe

A. D. severe Trials and Afflictions ; and this 1525. Hope was afterwards continually increased Insolence of the Imperialists. by the Conduct of the Cæsarean Generals in Italy. These Commanders, grown most insolent by so great a Victory, and flattering themselves that all Men must submit, and all Difficulties give Way to their Will and Pleasure, lost the Opportunity of an Agreement with the Venetians, violated their Engagements to the Pontiff, and filled him, and the Duke of Milan, and all Italy with Jealousies, scattering Seeds of new Disturbances, which at last brought Cæsar under a Necessity of taking a precipitous Resolution, to the very great endangering of his State in Italy, had it not been over-ruled by his old good Fortune, and the most malignant Fate of the Pontiff ; Points certainly most worthy of particular Notice, because from such memorable Events are understood the Counsels and Foundations preparatory to them, which are often secret, and many times divulged in a Way and Manner very far distant from the Truth.

THE

A. D.

1525.

THE Pontiff then had hardly capitulated with the Viceroy, when he received large Offers from France, to incite him to a War ; and tho' there were not wanting Encouragements from many to the same Purpose, and the Distrust which he had before conceived of the Imperialists was not diminished, yet he resolved to proceed in all Affairs after such a Manner as to give no Cause for entertaining any Suspicion of his Actions. Wherefore as soon as he understood that the Viceroy had accepted and published the Convention that was made in Rome, he caused it to be also published in St. John Lateran, without waiting the Arrival of the promised Ratification of Cæsar, for the more effectual Demonstration of his Mind, honouring the Publication, which was made the first of May, with his Presence, and the Solemnity used at his Coronation. He solicited the Florentines to pay the Money they had promised, and employed all his Interest to bring the Venetians into an Agreement with the 1525.

Im-

A. D.

Imperialists, who, on the other hand, gave him many just Causes of Complaint. For they would not accept, in Part of the Money promised, the Twenty Five Thousand Ducats paid by the Florentines according to his Orders while the Agreement was under Negotiation, the Viceroy having the Conscience to pretend that if it had been stipulated otherwise it had been done without his Commission. The Soldiers also had not evacuated the Dominions of the Church, but, on the contrary, the Piacentine was full of Garrisons. To these Grievances from the Cæsareans, which perhaps might in some measure be excused by the Want of Money and Quarters, was added that not only in the Change of the State of Siena, they gave Suspicions of Disaffection to the Pontiff, but afterwards suffered the Citizens of the Monte de' Nove to be abused, and spoiled of their Goods by the Liber-tines, tho', on his frequent Complaints, they had given him Hopes of Redress. But what above all Things gave him most Uneasiness was the Viceroy's hearkening

kening to the Duke of Ferrara, and ^{A D.} giving him Hopes that he would not ^{1525.} compel him to evacuate Reggio and Rubiera, and to prevail with Cæsar to take his State under his Protection, tho' he had every Day promised the Pontiff that as soon as the Florentines had finished their Payments he would put him in Possession of those Towns. The Pontiff, to solicit the Accomplishment, and to obtain that the Troops should evacuate the State of the Church, sent to him Cardinal Salviati, his Legate in Lombardy, and deputed Legate to Cæsar. The Viceroy assured the Cardinal that he would make the Duke restore Reggio by Force of Arms, if he refused to do it voluntarily; but the Effects did by no means correspond with his Words, which being a Point not excusable by a Want of Money, for there would be a larger Sum coming to him on account of the Restitution of those Towns, gave Room for probable Conjectures that it proceeded either from a Desire to humble the Pope, or to gain over the Duke of

VOL. VIII. T Ferrara,

A. D. Ferrara, or from a Design, which they 1525. constantly had in View, to oppress the Liberties of Italy.

Cæsar rejects the separate Articles of the Treaty with
 the Pope.

THESE Things gave Suspicion and almost incredible Vexation of Mind to the Pontiff, which were much exasperated by his imagining that these Proceedings were conformable to the Will of Cæsar. That Prince, having sent the Pontiff the Letters of Ratification of the Confederacy made in his Name by the Viceroy, delayed to ratify the Three Articles stipulated separately from the Capitulation; alledging that, as to the Retitution of the Towns held by the Duke of Ferrara, it was not in his Power to prejudice the Rights of the Empire, nor use Force with that Duke, who declared that he held them in Fee from the Empire. He proposed therefore that this Difference should be decided by a Trial at Law, or by an amicable Composition; and it was understood that he would have been well pleased that the Towns should remain to the Duke under his Investiture,
 for

for which he should pay him One Hundred Thousand Ducats, paying also to the Pontiff the like Sum for the Investiture of Ferrara, and for the Penalty charged on the Contract which he had made with Adrian. He alledged that it was impertinent to make an Agreement with his Ministers about supplying the Dutchy of Milan with Salt, because the head Profits of that Dutchy, by the Investiture which is granted, tho' not yet consigned, belonged to Francesco Sforza: And therefore the Viceroy had not bound himself simply in the Article to bring Sforza under an Obligation to take the Salt, but to procure his Consent; which Promise, including in it the Act of a Third Person, was notoriously, as to any Effect of obliging either himself or others, null and invalid. However, out of a Desire to gratify the Pontiff, he would have brought it about that the Duke should give his Consent, had not the Affair no longer concerned his own Interest, but that of another, because the Duke of Milan, in Recompence for the Assistance he had received from the

A. D.

1525.

A D. Archduke, had agreed to take the Salt 1525. of him; and that he would yet interpose his Endeavours that his Brother, on receiving in Compensation a handsome Sum of Money, should give his Consent, not for Perpetuity, as was expressed in the Article, but during the Life of the Pontiff. Nor did he admit of the Article relating to Benefices, unless to what was expressed in the Investiture were added the Clause, “ what had been practised by the Kings his Predecessors.”

ON account of these Difficulties the Pope refused to accept the Letters of Ratification, and to send his own to Cæsar, demanding that, since Cæsar had not ratified within the Term of Four Months, according to the Promise of the Viceroy, the Florentines should be reimbursed the One Hundred Thousand Ducats. To this Demand he received an Answer, rather captious and cavilling than reasonable and solid: That the Condition of the Restitution of the One Hundred Thousand Ducats was not inserted

serted in the Instrument, but promised, A. D. 1525. in a separate Article, by the Agents of the Viceroy, with an Oath, nor had any Reference to the Ratification of the Confederacy, which Cæsar had ratified within the Term of Four Months, and sent the Letters of Ratification in due Form. The Pontiff also came to have Notice that the Talk of all the Court of Cæsar fully discovered their evil Disposition towards the Affairs of Italy, and he knew also that the Generals of his Army went about to persuade him that, in order to secure Italy wholly to himself, it was the best Way to cause Modena to be restored to the Duke of Ferrara, to reinstate the Bentivogli in Bologna, and to take upon himself the Dominion of Florence, Siena, and Lucca, as Towns appertaining to the Empire. Finding himself therefore full of Anxiety and Suspicion, and at a Loss where to apply for Support, and being apprised that the French offered to give up Italy as a Prey to Cæsar, he was of necessity obliged to have recourse to Temporising and Dissimulation.

The Pope
apprehenfive of Cæsar's
Power.

THE Pontiff was at this Time employed in negotiating an Accommodation between the Venetians and the Viceroy, who, besides obliging themselves anew to defend the Dutchy of Milan for the future, demanded of them a very large Sum of Money by way of Satisfaction for Non-observance of the past Confederacy. Many were the Reasons which inclined the Venetians to yield to Necessity, many which, on the contrary, moved them to stand in Suspense; so that their Counsels were variable, and full of Irresolution. At last however, after many Disputes, astonished, like the rest, at so great a Victory of Cæsar, and seeing themselves standing alone and destitute on all Sides, they commissioned their Ambassador Pietro da Pescara, who resided with the Viceroy, to confirm the League anew, in the same Manner as it had been done before, but paying Cæsar, in Satisfaction for what was past, Eighty Thousand Ducats. But the Viceroy farther insining, and absolutely determining not to renew the Confederacy unless they paid One Hundred Thousand, it happened, as it often falls out in Affairs which are debated with an ill Will, that so much Time was spent in disputing about this small Sum, that the Venetians received Notice that the King of England was no longer so much incensed against the French as had been hitherto apprehended; and besides, such a Multitude of German Foot in the Imperial Army, after Payment of their Arrears, were dismissed, that the Venetian Senate, secure of not being molested for the present, resolved to stand a little longer in Suspense, and to reserve to themselves, as much as possible, the Liberty of taking such Resolutions as, from the universal Progress of Affairs, they should conclude to be most for their Advantage.
Con-

THE WARS IN ITALY. 295

A. D: 1525.
Treaty between the Viceroy and Venetians miscarries.

THESE Causes, besides a constant Desire to put the Thing in Execution, stimulated the Viceroy and the other Generals to remove the Person of the French King into a secure Place, judg-

A. D. 1525. ing that, from the bad Disposition of all around them, they could not keep him without Danger in the Dutchy of Mi- lan. They resolved therefore to conduct him to Genoa, and from thence by Sea to Naples, in order to confine him in Castel Nuovo, where an Apartment was already prepared for him. The King was extremely concerned at this Resolution, for it had been his ardent Desire from the Beginning to be conducted to Spain, flattering himself I know not whether from imagining the natural Disposition of others the same with his own, or because Men are apt to deceive themselves with vain Hopes of what they eagerly desire, that, if he were once admitted to Cæsar's Presence, he could, either trusting to his Goodness, or by the Conditions he intended to propose to him, easily prevail upon him to set him at Liberty. The Viceroy ardently desired the same for the Exaltation of his own Glory, but being restrained from executing his Design by Fear of the French Fleet, Montmorency, by common Consent, was dispatched to Madam the Re-

Regentess, and obtaining of her Six ^{A. D.} Light Gallies of those that were in the ^{1525.} Port of Marseilles, on a Promise that, as soon as the King was arrived in Spain, they should be restored, he returned with them to Porto Fino, whither the Person of the King was already conducted. These Gallies, joined with Sixteen others of Cæsar's, that had at first been designed to convey him to Naples, and all manned with Spanish Foot, on the Seventh Day of June set Sail, steering their Course for Spain (while not only the Italian Princes, but all the Imperial Generals, and Bourbon, assured themselves that the King was on his Voyage to Naples) and, after a prosperous Navigation, arrived in Eight Days at Roses, a Port of Catalonia, to the inexpressible Joy of Cæsar, who knew nothing till that Day of this Resolution. On the first Notice of the King's Arrival he gave Orders that, in all Places through which he passed, he should be received with the greatest Honours; but took Care however, till it should be otherwise determined, that he should

King of France
conducted to Spain.

A. D.

1525.

be kept under safe Custody, in the Castle of Sciativa near Valentia, a Castle appropriated by the Kings of Aragon, in antient Times, to the Imprisonment of great Men, and in which the Duke of Calabria had last of all for many Years been confined. But this Resolution appearing too rigorous to the Viceroy, and very different from the Promises he had made the King in Italy, he obtained of Cæsar, by his Letters, that, till a new Resolution, he should have a Residence in a Country Seat near Valentia, where he had the Convenience of Hunting and other Diversions. After the Viceroy had settled him in this Place under a sufficient Guard, leaving with him General Alarcone, in whose Custody he had continually remained, he waited, together with Montmorency, on Cæsar, to report to him the State of Italy, and of Affairs hitherto debated with the King, advising him, for many Reasons, to think seriously of coming to some Agreement with him, since he could expect no sincere Friendship, nor faithful Alliance from the Italians.

Cæsar

Cæsar therefore, after he had heard the A. D.
 Viceroy and Montmorency, resolved that ^{1525.} the King of France should be conducted to Castile, and confined in the Castle of Madrid, a Place at a great Distance from the Sea, and from the Borders of France, where, tho' he was treated with all the Ceremonies and Reverence due to so great a Prince, he was under careful and strict Custody, with Leave to ride out several Times in a Day on a Mule. Nor did Cæsar consent to admit him into his Presence till an Agreement should either be settled, or brought to such a Forwardness as should give certain Hopes of settling it. And that this Agreement should be negotiated by an honourable Person, and in Effect the same as the King, Montmorency was dispatched with Speed to France, to procure the Coming of the Dutches of Alençon, the King's Sister, a Widow, with full Power to conclude an Accommodation; and, to prevent all Obstacles from new Difficulties, a Truce was soon after made between Cæsar and the Government of France till the End
 of

A. D. of December next ensuing. Cæsar also 1525. ordered that Part of the Gallies which came with the Viceroy should return to Italy, for conveying the Duke of Bourbon to Spain, without whose Presence he declared he would make no Agreement; but the Gallies for Want of Money were but slowly equipped.

CÆSAR seeming much disposed to an universal Peace among Christians, and at the same time to put in Order the Affairs of Italy, solicited with many Instances the Pontiff to hasten the Departure of Cardinal Salviati, or of other proper Persons, with full Powers.
 And as he had determined to join in Matrimony with the Infanta of Portugal, his Cousin-German, and consequently related to him in the second Degree, he dispatched Lopes Urtado to the Pontiff, to demand a Dispensation, having first excused himself to the King of England, by declaring that he knew not how to resist the Will of his People. By the same Lopes, who set out at the End of July, he sent the Privileges

Cæsar sues for a Dispensation to marry his Cousin-German.

leges of the Investiture of the Dutchy A. D. of Milan to Francesco Sforza, on Con- ^{1525.} dition of his paying down One Hundred Thousand Ducats, and obliging himself to pay Five Hundred Thousand more at different Times, and to take Salt from the Archduke his Brother.
He also carried Orders for all the Troops ^{His Or-} in the Marquisate of Saluzzo, except the ^{ders.} Spanish Foot, to be disbanded, that Six Hundred Men at Arms should return to the Kingdom of Naples, and the rest remain in the Dutchy of Mi- lan, and that the Marquis of Pescara should be Captain General of the Army. To these Orders Cæsar added that a Sum of Money which he had remitted to Genoa for fitting out Four Caragues, with an Intention of passing immediately into Italy in Person, should be appropriated to the Use of the Army, for he had determined not to leave Spain at present, and that the Protonotary Carracciolo should repair from Milan to Venice, with a Commission to induce that Senate to a new Confederacy, or at least that every one might

A. D. might be satisfied that all his Actions 1525. tended to the universal Peace of Christians.

Pope and Venetians
 uneasy at the Removal of the King of
France.

BUT the Removal of the King of France into Spain had given very great Uneasiness to the Pope and the Venetians, because, as the Army of Cæsar was pretty much diminished, it appeared to them that, in whatever Part of Italy the King's Person was confined, the Necessity of keeping him well guarded would sufficiently embarrass the Cæsareans; whence either some Opportunity might easily present itself for setting him at Liberty, or at the least the Difficulty of conducting him to Spain, or the little Security of holding him in Italy, would constrain Cæsar to model the public Affairs by the Patterns of Honour and Justice. But when they saw that he was gone for Spain, and that he himself, deceived with vain Hopes by his Enemies, had furnished them with the Means for conveying him into a secure Prison, they perceived that whatever was the Subject of Treaties or Debates was

THE WARS IN ITALY. 303

was absolutely in the Power of Cæsar, A. D. and that nothing could be founded on ^{1525.} the Negotiations and Offers of the French. Hence Cæsar's Reputation every Day increasing, the Laws of all Proceedings were begun to be expected from that Court.

NOR am I certain whether the Duke The same of Bourbon, and the Marquis of Pesca- creates ra were not, tho' for different Reasons, Misunder-as much dissatisfied that the Viceroy standings had, without their Knowledge, conduct- between ed the most Christian King to Spain : Cæsar's Bourbon, because, finding himself driven Generals. out of France on account of the Friendship which he had contracted with the Emperor, it more concerned him than any other to be present at all the Negotiations for an Agreement ; and therefore he was disposed to pass also himself into Spain, but being necessitated to wait the Return of the Gallies which were gone with the Viceroy, he delayed his Departure longer than he could have wished : And the Marquis was not

A. D.
1525 Marquis
of Pescara
dissatisfied on what Grounds. not only provoked at his being slighted by the Viceroy, but also dissatisfied with Cæsar for not acknowledging, as he fancied, in a due Proportion, his Merits, and the noble Exploits performed by him in the late Wars, and especially in the Battle of Pavia, from which Victory he had acquired more Glory than all the rest of the Generals, and yet it seemed to him that Cæsar was lavish enough of his Acknowledgments to the Viceroy, bestowing on him all his Praises, and Marks of Esteem. This the Marquis no longer able to bear, wrote Letters to Cæsar full of most bitter Invectives against the Viceroy, complaining that he had been undeservedly slighted by him to such a Degree as not to be thought worthy to be at least privy to such a Resolution; and that if Matters had been ordered, and Measures taken in pursuance of the Viceroy's Counsels and Determination, not only the King of France would not have been taken, but as soon as Milan was lost the Cæsarean Army would have abandoned the Defence of Lombardy,

Lombardy, and retired to Naples : That he was gone to triumph for a Victory in which it was notorious to the whole Army that he had no Share; and that being in the Heat of the Battle he lost all Courage and Counsel, and was heard by many to cry out several Times, “ We are undone;” which, if he should deny it, he offered himself ready to prove to his Face, according to the military Laws, with Arms in Hand. The Discontent of the Marquis was increased, because when, immediately after the Victory, he had sent to take Possession of Carpi, with an Intention to obtain that Town of Cæsar for himself, his Desire was frustrated, because Cæsar, having granted it to Prospero Colonna two Years before, declared that, tho’ he had never received the Investiture, he was resolved, for the Benefit of Vespasiano his Son, to preserve to the Memory of Prospero dead that Reward which he had given to the Merit and Services of him living. This Reason, tho’ it was just and grateful, and the Marquis ought to have been pleased with Examples of Gratitude,

A. D.

1525.

A. D. 1525. tude, if on no other account, yet because they increased the Hopes that his great Services would in time come to be rewarded, had however no Effect upon him. For, as he had a high Opinion of himself, he thought it fit that this desire in him, sprung from a covetous Ambition, and an implacable Hatred born to the Name of Prospero, should be preferred to all other, tho' never so just, Regards. Wherefore he made most heavy Complaints against Cæsar and the whole Council, and lamented his Case so publicly in Italy, and with such Detestations of Cæsar's Ingratitude, as gave Encouragement to others to attempt the Execution of new Projects. Hence was Cæsar, even if he had entertained no Thoughts of making any farther Seizures in Italy, furnished with a just Cause, and in a manner necessitated to form new Schemes; and even, supposing that he had ambitious Ends, he had Opportunities of covering them with the most plausible Pretences, and most specious Colourings that his Heart could have wished; and because this was the Origin

THE WARS IN ITALY. 307

Origin of very great Movements, it is A. D. necessary that it should be very particu- 1525. larly explained.

THE War which, in the Time of Causes of Leo X. was commenced by him and new Com-Cæsar for driving the King of France motions in out of Italy, was undertaken under Pre- Italy. tence of restoring Francesco Sforza to the Dutchy of Milan; and tho' in the Execution of it, after the Victory was obtained, he was put in possession of that State, and of the Castle of Milan, and of the other Fortresses as soon as they were recovered, yet, from the Splendor and flourishing State of that Dutchy, and the Conveniency of its Situation, many were still apprehensive, as they had been from the Beginning, that Cæsar aspired to the Sovereignty, fancying to themselves that the powerful Opposition which he met with from the King of France was the Cause that as yet he concealed his ambitious Desire, because he would otherwise have put the People in a Ferment, who were ardently desirous of Francesco Sforza,

A. D. and have stirred up against him all 1525. Italy, which would by no means be satisfied at such an Increase of his Grandeur. Francesco Sforza therefore held that Dutchy, but under very great Subjection, and Burdens almost intolerable. For his whole Resort for defending himself against the French consisting in Cæsar and his Army, he was necessitated not only to respect him as his Prince, but also to stoop to the Will of his Generals, and was forced to maintain those Troops which were not paid by Cæsar, sometimes by giving them Money, which he drew from his Subjects with very great Strainings and Difficulties, sometimes by suffering them to live at Discretion, now in one Quarter, then in another of his State, except in the City of Milan. These Proceedings, tho' very grievous in themselves, were yet rendered intolerable by the Temper of the Spaniards, which is avaricious, fraudulent, and, when they have Room for displaying their natural Disposition, most insolent. The Dangers however which hung over the People from

from the French, to whom they were ^{A. D.} bitter Enemies, and the Hopes that their ^{1525.} Troubles would some Time or other have an End, made them bear even beyond their Strength, and more than their Means would admit. But after the Victory of Pavia the People could no longer endure to see the same Necessities ceased, since the King was taken Prisoner, and yet to feel themselves labouring under the same Calamities, and therefore demanded that all or the greater Part of the Army should be removed out of that Dutchy. The Duke, who had hitherto enjoyed nothing of the Sovereignty but the bare Name, was eagerly desirous of the Removal, and the more because he apprehended that Cæsar, now secure of the King of France, would either seize on his State for himself, or grant it to Persons who should wholly depend on him. This Suspicion, which arose from the very Nature of Things, was not a little increased by the insolent Speeches thrown out by the Viceroy before he conducted the King of France into Spain, and also by the

A. D. 1525. other Generals, and by the Marks of Disrespect which they shewed to the Duke, as well as by their openly wishing that Cæsar would oppress him, but much more when Cæsar having, after many Delays, put into the Hands of the Viceroy the Articles of the Investiture, that Minister, in offering it to the Duke, had demanded that, for the Reimbursement of the Charges which Cæsar had been at for the Acquisition and Defence of that State, he should pay at certain Times One Million and Two Hundred Thousand Ducats: So exorbitant a Charge, that the Duke was obliged to have recourse to Cæsar for reducing it to a tolerable Sum*! But these Difficulties raised a Doubt that those extravagant Demands were interposed in order to delay the Investiture. There have since been alledged, by those who have endeavoured to excuse Francesco Sforza from Necessity, many other Causes Cæsar suspected of aspiring to the Duchy of Milan.

Causes of Suspicion.

* The Viceroy in making this Demand affirmed that it was not by way of Sale, for the Emperor had spent a greater Sum in acquiring that State. Capella.

Causes that justly raised his Suspicion, A. D. and particularly his having received ^{1525.} Notice that the Generals had appointed to detain him, for which Reason, when he was called by the Viceroy to a certain Meeting, he had refused to go, feigning himself sick; and observed the same Caution as to all other Places where they had it in their Power to offer him Violence. This Suspicion, whether true or vain, was the Cause that when he saw there were but few Troops left in the Dutchy of Milan, Part of the Spaniards being gone, first with the Viceroy, and afterwards with Bourbon into Spain, and many also who had enriched themselves by such vast Plunder, having retired one after another into various Places, and considered also the high Indignation which appeared in the Marquis of Pescara, applying his Thoughts on securing himself from this Danger, he entered into Hopes that, with the Consent of the Marquis, he might get rid of the Army. The Author of this Counsel was Girolamo Morone, his Great Chancellor, and of the highest Authority

A. D. rity with him, and for his Wit, Elo-1525. quence, Dexterity, Invention, and Ex-Character perience, and for his often resisting, with of Morone. the greatest Constancy, the Shocks of adverse Fortune, was a noted Man in our Times, and would have been more so, if those Talents had been accompanied with a greater Sincerity of Mind, a Love of Honesty and Justice, and with such a Maturity of Judgment, as that his Counsels had not been often rather precipitous or imprudent, than honourable and circumspect.

THIS Minister, founding the Mind of the Marquis in their private Conference, pushed the Matter so far that they had under Debate the cutting those Troops in Pieces, and making the Marquis King of Naples, provided they could procure the Concurrence of the Pope and Venetians. The Pontiff, full of Suspicion and Anxiety, being consulted by the Direction of Morone, did not seem at all averse to the Project, but, on the other hand, not to discover the Plot, but to prepare himself a Refuge in case it it did not succeed, under a Show of A. D. Affection, admonished Cæsar to keep ^{1525.} his Generals well contented. The Venetians embraced the Scheme with great Eagerness, and every one persuaded themselves they should find no less Readiness in the Mother of the King of France, who was already sensible that since her Son was arrived in Spain his Deliverance would not proceed with that Facility as had been imagined. It is not doubted but that such a Project would have succeeded, if the Marquis of Pescara had sincerely proceeded against Cæsar; but whether he hearkened to those Counsels at first, or not, there are various Opinions even among the Spaniards, and in the Court of Cæsar itself. The Generality, making an Estimate of the Times, and of the Movements of Affairs, have believed that, in the Beginning, he really concurred with the rest, but that afterwards, on considering the Multitude of Difficulties that might arise in Process of Time, and deterred especially by the continual

A. D. al Negotiations of the French with Cæ- 1525. ſar, and at laſt by the Reſolution taken to ſend the Dutcheſs of Alençon to Cæ- ſar, he took other Meaſures. Some go farther, and affirm that he ſo long delayed to give Notice to Cæſar of the Innovations that were contriving in Italy, till Advice of the Plot coming from Antonio da Leva and Marino Abbot of Nagera, Commiſſary in the Cæſarean Army, all the Court ſtood amazed at the Silence of the Marquis. But, however the Caſe then ſtood, it is certain that not long after he ſent Giovanni Battiſta Caſtaldo to Cæſar, and laid open to him the whole Plot, and by his Conſent continued the ſame Practices; and, what is more, that he might dive into the Thoughts of every one, and deprive them of all Shifts and Power of ever denying that they had given their Conſent to the Plot, he undertook of himſelf to ſpeak of it to the Duke of Milan, and perſuaded Morone to uſe his Intereſt with the Pontiff, who had very lately conferred upon him the perpetual Government of the City of Be- nevento, nevento, and with whom the Marquis ^{A. D.} himself corresponded with the greatest ^{1525.} Professions of Friendship and Service, so far that his Holiness deputed Domenico Sauli, a Genoesè, with a Brief of Credentials, to confer with him on the same Subject. ^{League forming against Caesar.}

THE Articles under Debate were in ^{The Arti-} Substance, That between the Pope, the ^{cles.} Government of France, and other States of Italy should be contracted a League, of which the Marquis of Pescara was to be constituted Captain General; and that the said Marquis, after distributing the Spanish Infantry into Quarters in different Places in the Dutchy of Milan, should put himself at the Head of those who were willing to follow him, and that the rest with Antonio da Leva, who was next to him in Command, should be stripped and put to the Sword: And that the Enterprize on the Kingdom of Naples should be undertaken by the joint Forces of all the Confederates in favour of the Marquis, on whom the Pope was to confer the Investiture.

To

A. D. 1525. To all this the Marquis seemed to interpose no other Difficulty than that he was willing, before he ventured any farther, to be well satisfied that he could undertake such an Enterprize without staining his Honour and Loyalty, in case it should be commanded him by the Pope. On this Point it came to be considered, to whom the Marquis, who was a Native, and a Baron of the Kingdom of Naples, owed most Obedience, whether to Cæsar, who, by the Investiture of the Church, had the Profits of the Dominion of that Kingdom, or to the Pontiff, who, by virtue of being supreme Lord, had the direct Dominion. On this Article, both at Milan, by Order of Francesco Sforza, and at Rome, by Appointment of the Pope, the ablest Civilians were consulted very privately, with a Suppression of the true Names.

THE Hopes conceived against Cæsar were increased by the Offers of the Princess Regent, who imagining that Cæsar's Necessities, or at least his Fears would would promote the Treaty that was in A. D.

Agitation for the Delivery of her Son, ^{1525.} solicited the taking up Arms, promising to send into Lombardy Five Hundred Lances, and to contribute a great Sum of Money towards the Expences. Nor was Morone wanting to confirm the Minds of the rest in this Resolution; for, besides demonstrating the Facility, even without the Assistance of the Marquis of Pescara, of destroying that Army, which was considerably diminished in Number, he promised, in the Name of the Duke, that if the Marquis did not stand firm to the Measures concerted, as soon as the other Designs were in Readiness, he should be secured in the Castle together with the other Commanders who daily resorted thither to consult. Though these Opportunities appeared very promising, they would not have been thought by the Pontiff sufficient to induce him to take up Arms without the Marquis of Pescara, if, at the same time, he had not heard that Provisions were ordered to Genoa for fitting out Four Caraques,
and

A. D. and had also received Information from 1525.

Spain of Cæsar's Inclination to pass into Italy. These Advices creating him vast Uneasiness, both from the Condition of the present Times, and from the inveterate Disposition of the Roman Pontiffs, to whom nothing used to be more dreadful than the Coming of Roman Emperors armed into Italy, out of a Desire to obviate that Danger, he dispatched, with Consent of the Venetians, privately to France, one Sigismondo, Secretary to Alberto da Carpi, a Person of Dexterity, and a great Confident of the Pope, in order to conclude the Treaty negotiated with Madam the Regentess. Sigismondo, riding Post, was murdered in the Night by some Highwaymen, near the Lago d' Iseo, in the Territory of Brescia. This Accident not coming to Light for many Days, the Pontiff much doubted that the Man had been way-laid, and taken privately into some Place by Orders of the Imperial Generals, and perhaps of the Marquis himself, whose Proceedings, on account of

Pope's Envoy to France
murdered.

THE WARS IN ITALY. 319

of the Delays which he interposed, began to be much suspected.

A. D.
1525.

IN this State of Affairs arrived Dispatches given by Cæsar to Lopes Urtado, who lying sick in Savoy, sent them by a proper Messenger to Milan, with Letters Patent, vesting the Office of Captain General in the Person of the Marquis of Pescara, Marquis of Pescara made Captain General. who, to continue in the same Dissimulation with the others, pretended that he was not very well pleased with his Advancement, tho' he immediately accepted of the Patent. He carried also a Commission to the Protonotary Caracciolo to repair to Venice in the Name of Cæsar, for inducing that Senate to a new Confederacy, or at least for satisfying all Persons of Cæsar's Desire to live in Peace with all Christian Powers. Francesco Sforza, who began already to labour under a dangerous Disorder, accepted of the Investiture of the Dutchy, and paid towards the Cost Fifty Thousand Ducats, but did not on that account break off the Negotiation begun with the Marquis.

VARIOUS

A. D.

1525.

Dubious
Step of Cæsar.

VARIOUS were the Opinions whether these Dispatches or Instructions of Cæsar were sincere or artificial; for many believed that it was not his real Intention to give Peace to Italy: Others doubted that, under Fear of new Movements, he was willing to keep Men under Suspence with various Hopes, and thought of gaining Time by granting the Investiture, and giving in Appearance a Commission for calling off the Army, which would be highly acceptable to all Italy, but that he had given private Orders to his Generals not to remove the Troops. Nor were there wanting afterwards some who persuaded themselves that Cæsar was before well informed by the Marquis of Pescara of the Plot carried on with Morone, and had therefore given such Orders, that they should be obeyed, but should serve for his Justification; and by these Hopes to lull the Minds of the People in Security till a proper Time appeared for putting his Designs in Execution. It being very difficult,

in

in so doubtful a Case, to come to the Knowledge of the Truth, especially since it is not known whether at the Time when Giovanni Battista Castaldo, sent by the Marquis to make a Discovery of the Plot, arrived at the Court, Lopes Utardo had been as yet dispatched; but, considering the Steps taken afterwards by Cæsar in many Affairs, it is without Doubt less fabulous to adopt for Truth the better and more favourable Interpretation.

THE Marquis in the mean time continued to entertain Morone and the rest with the same Hopes, and yet to delay the Execution under various Pretences, for which he had an Opportunity given him by the Sickness of the Duke of Milan, which increased to such a Degree that every one expected his Death. For all the Generals pretending that in such a Case that State would revert to Cæsar, the supreme Lord of the Fief, the Marquis would not only be prevented from removing the Army, but be under a Necessity of sending for Two

Marquis
of Pescara
continues his Dissimulation.

A. D.

1525.

Thousand more German Foot, and to give Orders for keeping in Readiness a greater Number. Such a powerful Body of Forces, quartered in the Dutchy of Milan, he alledged would deprive him of the Means of disbanding or injuring them, but gave them Hopes that he would execute the Measures concerted between them as soon as ever it lay in his Power. In the mean time, while an Opportunity was expected, to declare to the World, by his Proceedings, the profound Reverence he had for the Pontiff, he freed the State of the Church from the Garrisons of which his Holiness had made such heavy Complaints.

King of France
sick and recovers.

BUT at the same time a new Accident that happened in Spain had like to have introduced a new Scene of Affairs: For the King of France, extremely mortified at Cæsar's refusing to afford him his Presence when he requested it, took it so much to Heart that he fell into a Disorder while he was in the Castle of Madrid, which reduced him to such Extremity, that the Physician

Physicians appointed to attend him signified to Cæsar that there were no Hopes of his Recovery if he himself did not come in Person to comfort him, and give him Hopes of his Liberty. While he was proposing to go, his great Chancellor dissuaded him, telling him that his Honour required him not to go thither, unless with a Disposition to release him immediately, and without any Sort of Convention: Otherwise it would be not a royal but mercenary Humanity, and a Desire to procure his Recovery not out of a Tenderness of his Health, but purely from a Regard to Self-interest, and a Fear of losing by his Death the Opportunity of reaping the Fruits expected from the Victory: Advice certainly deserving Remembrance, and worthy to be accepted by so great a Prince; but others counselling him to the contrary, he set out Post to pay the King a Visit. The Visitation was but short, because the most Christian King lay, in a manner, at the Point of Death, but full of kind Words, and certain Assurances of Releasement immediately upon Reco-

A. D.

1525.

A. D. very. And, whatever was the Cause, 1525. whether the Consolation which he received. or that Youth was of itself superior to the Nature of the Disorder, he began after this Visit to find such Relief, that in a few Days he was out of Danger, tho' he was but slow in recovering his former Health.

BUT neither the Difficulties which appeared on the Part of Cæsar, nor the Hopes given by the Italians, had diverted the Journey of Madame d' Alençon to Spain, because nothing was more difficult to the French than to break off the Negotiations for an Agreement with those who had it in their Power to restore them their King; and nothing more easy to Cæsar than by feeding the French with Hopes to divert them from the Thoughts of taking up Arms, and by this Artfulness to keep the Italians in Suspence, so that they should not venture to take new Resolutions: And thus sometimes by slackening, sometimes by straining the Reins of his Conduct, he

Artful
 Conduct
 of Cæsar.

he held the Minds of all in Confusion and Perplexity.

A. D.

1525.

MADAME d' Alençon met with the Marks of a gracious Reception, and Hopes from Cæsar, but the Success of her Affair proved hard and difficult. For in the Conference on the Fourth Day of October, when she requested of him his Widow Sister in Marriage for the King, Cæsar answered her Demand by saying that it was not in his Power without the Consent of the Duke of Bourbon. The other Particulars were debated by Commissioners appointed on each Side, Cæsar obstinately insisting on the Restitution of Burgundy as his proper Inheritance, and the French not consenting unless he would either receive it in Dowry, or have it legally tried to which of the two Princes it belonged; in the other Conditions the Parties might have easily come to an Agreement. But there remaining so wide a Difference between them in the Affair of Burgundy, Madam d' Alençon at last returned into France, without ob-

A. D. 1525.
Madam d'Alençon returns to France without Success.
 taining any other End by her Journey than the Opportunity of seeing her Brother, who, at parting with her, despairing now more than ever of his Liberty, is said to have ordered her to recommend, on his Part, to his Mother and those of the Council, a strict Regard to the Honour and Benefit of the Crown of France, without any Consideration of his Person any more than if he were dead. The Negotiations, however, were not interrupted by her Departure, for there remained the President of Paris, with the Bishops of Ambrun and Tarbe, who had been treating till now, but with small Hopes, Cæsar not hearkening to any Condition without the Restitution of Burgundy, nor the King consenting to yield it up without the utmost Necessity.

Cardinal Salviati
Pope's Legate to Cæsar
 AT this Time arrived at Court Cardinal Salviati, the Pope's Legate: He was received by Cæsar with very great Honour, and began to treat of the Heads of his Commission, which principally contained the Ratification of the Articles Articles stipulated by the Viceroy, soliciting also the Grant of the Investiture to the Duke of Milan for the common Security. But the Viceroy himself dissuaded the Restitution of Reggio and Rubiera, and by his Advice, and encouraged by the Hopes he had given him, the Duke of Ferrara, desirous of managing his own Cause at the Court of Cæsar, having obtained of the Pontiff a Promise that his State should not be molested by him for six Months, took a Progress as far as the Borders of the Kingdom of France, with a Resolution to pass forwards; but the Regentess refusing him a Pass, he returned at last to Ferrara.

THERE came also on the Carpet the Cause, between the Pontiff and Cæsar, of obtaining a Dispensation for enabling Cæsar to join in Matrimony with the Sister of the King of Portugal, whom he was determined to marry, tho' he had formerly promised the King of England with an Oath, that he would never take any other for his Wife than

A. D. that King's Daughter. The Pontiff 1525. proceeded but slowly in granting this Dispensation, being persuaded by many that the Desire of obtaining this Favour would render Cæsar more easy of Compliance in the Points under Debate; or at least that it was an imprudent Step, if a War should break out between them, to furnish him with Means for accumulating such a Mass of Money as he would certainly accumulate by this Matrimony; for the King of Portugal offered him in Dowry Nine Hunder-red Thousand Ducats, from which deducting that Part which by Agreement was to be allowed in Payment of Debts contracted by him to the King, it was supposed there would remain clear to him at least Five Hundred Thousand Ducats, besides Four Hundred Thousand Ducats, which, his own People consented to give him for what they called Service-Money, which, taking its Rise in antient Times from the Free Will of the People to succour the Necessities of their Kings, was reduced to an ordinary and stated Subsidy; and they offered

ed besides to give him Four Hundred ^{A. D.} Thousand more in case he consummated ^{1525.} this Matrimony. On the other side the Pontiff knew not how to resist the Importunities of the Duke of Sessa, the Cæsarean Ambassador: For you might observe in him an almost constant Repugnance between the Disposition of Things and the Execution of them, since being by Nature extreamly averse from granting any Favour demanded of him, he knew not also how to raise Difficulties, or to refuse with Constancy, but often suffered his Will to be overcome by the Importunities of the Petitioners; so that seeming for the most part to grant what was requested more out of Fear than Favour, he did not proceed in this Part of his Conduct with that Constancy, nor with that Majesty which the Greatness of his Dignity, and the Importance of the Business under Negotiation required. Thus it happened with respect to the Dispensation that was demanded, where, amidst the inward Struggles of his own Interest on one Side, and his Softness on the other,

he

A. D. 1525. he eased himself, as his Custom was, on the Backs of others, of a Load which, I know not whether for want of Boldness, or Constancy of Resolution, he was unable to support himself. He expedited by a Brief the Dispensation in the Form demanded by Cæsar, and sent it to Cardinal Salviati, with an Order that, if his Affairs with Cæsar took a happy Turn, as he was made to believe they would, the Cardinal, as soon as he arrived at Court, should give the Brief to Cæsar; otherwise should keep it in his Custody: A Commission in which the Servant, as shall appear in its proper Place, shewed as much Weakness and Inconstancy as his Lord.

BUT while the Cardinal was negotiating with Cæsar on the Heads of his Instructions, and was continually fed with Hopes that they would be ratified according to his Desire, there fell out in Lombardy Events of a very different Tendency. For the Duke of Milan being relieved from his Disorder in such a manner as to make it believed that he was at least out of Danger of dying soon, the Marquis of Pescara, who had Orders from Cæsar by Castaldo above-mentioned to provide against those Dangers by such Means as he thought most convenient, resolved to make himself Master of the Dutchy of Milan, under a Pretence that the Duke, by the Plot which he had carried on with the Assistance of Morone, had forfeited the Rights of Investiture, and that the Fief was reverted to Cæsar, the supreme Lord. The Marquis therefore being at Novara, tho' labouring under a considerable Disorder, Part of the Army being at Pavia, and the Germans quartered about Lodi, which two Cities he had caused to be fortified, sent unexpectedly for the Troops quartered in Piedmont and in the Marquisate of Saluzzo, which last they had seized soon after the Victory, to come to Novara, under colour of distributing them into Quarters through the whole State of Milan. He sent also for Morone, in whose Person it may be said, consisted the Importance of every Thing; for it was

A. D.

1525.

A. D. was certain that as soon as he should 1525. be secured the Duke of Milan, being left destitute of Men and Counsel, would make no Resistance; but while he was at Liberty it might be doubted that by his Parts, by his Experience, and by his Reputation, he would greatly obstruct the Execution of his Designs. It was also necessary that Cæsar should have in his Power the Person of Morone, who had been the Author and Instrument of all the secret Practices, that he might be enabled, from his Process, to justify the Charge against the Duke of Milan.
 There is nothing more difficult to avoid than Fate, and there is no Remedy against predestined Misfortunes. Morone might long since have known that what was concerted with the Marquis of Pescara would not take Effect, he knew that he was extremely hated by all the Spanish Soldiers, who already talked very freely of his Unfaithfulness, and that Antonio da Leva had threatened in Public to have him assassinated.
 It is not to be supposed that he had not considered the Importance of his Person,

Person, and that he had not considered the melancholy Condition of the Duke of Milan, at that Time useless and of no more Signification than if he were dead. Not many Days before the Plotters had been in Suspence, and full of Jealousies among themselves, every one advised him, not to go, and he himself stood in doubt whether to go or not. And yet, whether he had his Mind still possessed with the Dissimulation and Artifices of the Marquis, or relied on the great Friendship which he fancied he had contracted with him, or trusting to his Word of Honour, which, as he said afterwards, he had obtained of him in one of his Letters, or, to speak more truly, drawn by that Necessity which drags along those who will not suffer themselves to be led, he resolved to go as it were to a manifest Prison: A Conduct to me the more surprising as I remember to have heard Morone say several Times in the Army, in the Time of Leo, that there was not a Man in Italy of greater Malignity, or of less Faith than the Marquis of Pescara.

A. D. 1525. cara. Morone was kindly received by him, and they conferred together in a Chamber by themselves on the first Scheme of the Plot, and of cutting the Throats of the Spaniards and of Antonio da Leva, but in a Place where Antonio, whom the Marquis had concealed behind some Hangings of Tapestry, heard all the Discourse, and who, as soon as the Marquis was gone, it being the Fourteenth day of October, took Morone into Custody, and committed him to the Castle of Pavia, whither the Marquis himself went to examine him on the Particulars of what they had debated together, and where he gave an ample Detail of the whole Proceeding of the Conspiracy, accusing the Duke of Milan as privy to every Thing, which was the chief Point in View.

Morone made a Prisoner.

Demands of the Marquis of Pescara
on the
Duke of Milan. MORONE being imprisoned, the Marquis, who was before in Possession of Lodi and Pavia, demanded of the Duke that, for Security of the Emperor's State, he would give Orders for resigning into his Hands the City of Cremona, and the the Fortresses of Trezzo, Lecco, and Pizzichitone, which, for their Situation A. D. 1525. on the Passes of the Adda, are accounted the Keys of the Dutchy of Milan, promising, on Compliance to make no further Innovation. The Duke finding himself bare of every Thing, and destitute of Counsel and Hopes, immediately ordered the Places to be put into the Hands of the Marquis, who, after this was done, demanded farther to be admitted into the City of Milan, to confer, as he said, with the Duke; which was granted with the same Facility. As soon as he was entered Milan he sent to insist on the Delivery of the Castle of Cremona, not requiring that of Milan, because it was an improper Demand, since that Fortress was the Residence of the Duke's Person; he demanded however that, for the Security of Cæsar's Army, the Duke should consent that the Castle should be surrounded with an Entrenchment. Moreover he required him to deliver into his Hands Gian Angelo Riccio his Secretary, and Politiano, Secretary of Morone, that they might be examined on an

A. D. an Information which he had received 1525. of their having acted against Cæsar.

The Duke's
 Answer.

To these Demands the Duke answered that he held the Castles of Milan and Cremona in the Name, and at the Request of Cæsar, to whom he had always been a most faithful Vassal, and that he would not resign them to any one before he knew his Will, which that he might clearly understand he would immediately depute to him a proper Person, provided the Marquis would grant him a Passport; and that it did not appear to him consistent with Decency to consent to be in the mean time shut up in a Castle, from which Violence he would defend himself by any Means that lay in his Power: That he could not part with Gian Angelo, because he was intrusted in all his important Affairs, and was the only Minister he had at present about him; and that he had still greater Need of Morone's Secretary, in order to bring him before Cæsar, and by his Evidence to justify himself, in proving that during during his Sickness his Master had, in A. D. his Name, without his Knowledge, ^{1525.} made many Dispatches, which might be laid to his Charge, if he did not by this Means justify his Innocence, and make it appear that the Business and Correspondence of Morone were different and separate from what concerned him. At last, after a Multitude of Protestations and Replies that passed from one to the other in writing, the Marquis constrained the People of Milan to take an Oath of Fidelity to the Emperor, contrary to their Will, and with extream Reluctance and Mortification of all Parties, he bestowed Offices through the State in the Name of Cæsar, and began to cast an Entrenchment about the Castle of Cremona, and that of Milan, in which the Duke, being mightily encouraged with the Hopes of Relief given him by the Pope and Venetians, was determined to defend himself, having with him Eight Hundred chosen Men, and furnished it with as great a Stock of Provisions as the Shortness of Time would permit. Nor did he omit to obstruct

A. D. as much as possible the Working on 1525. the Trenches, which were carried along on the Outside, with a Ditch before them, at a greater Distance from the Castle than those cast up by Prospero Colonna.

ALL Italy was alarmed, and with Reason, on the Seizure of the Dutchy of Milan, being sensible that there would be no way left to avoid manifest Slavery whenever Cæsar should become Lord of Milan and Naples. The Pontiff above all was afflicted, seeing, with utmost Concern, those Negotiations which he had carried on with such Secrecy, not only for the Security of Milan, but for the Destruction of Cæsar's Army, and depriving him of the Kingdom of Naples, all blown up, and laid open to the World. This Discovery, perhaps, procured the Marquis of Pescara Favour with Cæsar, but in the Sight of all others eternal Infamy, not only because most People were still possessed with an Opinion that in the Beginning he had really an Intention to fall off from

from Cæſar, but alſo becauſe, on a Sup-poſition that he had been always faithful to him, it was eſteemed an infamous Piece of Treachery to have given Encouragement to Men, and drawn them in by ſuch a Strain of Double-dealing, and over-reaching Arts of Fraud; to enter into a Conſpiracy with him; on purpoſe that he might have an Opportunity to detect them, and to make himſelf great out of the Sins of others procured by his own Deceits and Subtleties.

A. D.
 1525.
 Conduct of Peſcara cenſured,

THIS Change in the Face of Affairs damped the Hopes of an Agreement, which was negotiated by the Protonota-ry Caracciolo with the Venetian Senate, and was in ſuch a Forwardneſs as to ſeem drawing to a Concluſion, by which the Venetians would have been obliged to renew the firſt Confederacy on the ſame Conditions, and to pay unto Cæſar, in Recompenſe of paſt Failings and Omiſſi-ons, Eighty Thouſand Ducats, excluding all Demands of future Contributions in Money. But this new Event which happened at Milan threw the Senate

A. D. 1525. into very great Perplexity, being on one hand vastly concerned to find themselves the only Power left in Italy to make Resistance against Cæsar, with the Danger, already threatened by the Marquis of Pescara, of having the War transferred into their own Dominions, for which Purpose there appeared already some Preparations; and no less embarrassed on the other hand, as knowing how mightily an Agreement with themselves would facilitate to Cæsar the Acquisition of the Milanese, which added to so many States, and to so many other Advantages, was the ready Way to bring themselves, with all the rest of Italy, under the Yoke. This Reflection was enforced by the continual and pathetic Persuasions of the Bishop of Bajeux, whom Madam the Regentess had appointed to treat of a Union between herself and the Italians against Cæsar. In this Exigency their Consultations were frequent, but dubious, and full of various Opinions; and, tho' it were most conformable to their Custom to accept of an Agreement, because it removed the the present Danger, whence they might A. D. have Hopes to trust their Affairs to ^{1525.} Length of Time, and to Opportunities that Republics, which, in Comparison to Princes, are immortal, have Reason to expect, yet it appeared also to them a Matter of too much Importtance that Cæsar should establish himself in the State of Milan, and that the French should be excluded from all Hopes of having any Friend or Ally in Italy. Wherefore, being determined at last to enter into no Obligation, they answered the Protonotary Caracciolo, That their past Conduct was sufficient Evidence to all the World, and he himself, who had been present at the Conclusion of the Confederacy, was a good Witness, how much they always coveted the Friendship of Cæsar, with whom they had confederated at a Time when their joining with the French would have been, as every one knew, of mighty Importance: And that they had always persevered, and now more than ever, in the same Disposition; but that they were of necessity held in Suspense

Answer of the Venetians to the Imperial Plenipo-tentiary.

A. D. 1525.  pense by observing a Change of so great Importance newly made in Lombardy, and especially when they reflected that both their Confederacy with Cæsar, and so many other Movements which had been set on Foot of late Years in Italy, were made for no other End than with a Design that the Dutchy of Milan should be settled on Francesco Sforza, as the principal Foundation of the Liberty and Security of Italy. Wherefore they intreated his Majesty, that, acting in this Case suitably to his own Temper, and known Goodness, he would remove this Innovation, and establish the Repose of Italy, as it was in his Power to do it, since he should always find them most readily disposed, both by their Authority and Forces, to follow this holy Inclination; nor would they ever give him any Cause to charge them with being wanting in any good Office that concerned either the universal Good, or his own particular Interests. This Answer giving no Hopes of a Conclusion, did not however produce a Rupture and Hostilities, because the Disorder of the Marquis of Pescara A. D. 1525. increased every Day, and Cæsar's Desire of first making himself Master of the whole State of Milan, and to establish that Acquisition on a firm Bottom, and so many other Affairs which lay upon his Hands, and wanted first to be dispatched, gave him no Leisure to set about an Enterprize of such great Moment.
the

BOURBON was by this time arrived, Memorable Passage of Bourbon.
 and on the Fourteenth Day of November he appeared at the Imperial Court.
 Of this Nobleman it deserves to be recorded that, tho' he was received by Cæsar with all the Demonstrations of Honour and Regard, and carested as a Brother-in-Law, yet all the Lords of the Court, who are accustomed, as it always happens, to follow, in other Cases, the Example of their Prince, abhorred him as an infamous Person, calling him a Traitor to his own King; and, what is more, when one of them was requested, in the Name of Cæsar, to consent that his Palace should be assigned

A. D. him for his Lodgings, he answered, ^{1525.} with a Castilian Greatness of Soul, that he would not refuse Cæsar whatever he pleased to desire, but knew that as soon as Bourbon should leave it, he should set it on Fire, as a Palace infected with Bourbon's Infamy, and unworthy to be inhabited by Men of Honour.

BUT the Honour paid by Cæsar to the Duke of Bourbon increased the Despondency of the French, who, on this account, and more by the Return of Madam d' Alençon without Effect, entertaining but small Hopes of an Agreement, tho' it was continually negotiated by proper Persons residing at Cæsar's Court, insisted with all Eagerness on making a League with the Pope, in which they were seconded by the Advice and Authority of the King of England, and by the frequent and earnest Sollicitations of the Venetians. Besides, there offered itself an Opportunity doubtless of great Moment, for about this Time, which was in the Beginning of December,

THE WARS IN ITALY. 345

December, died the Marquis of Pescara, A. D. ^{1525.} perhaps by the just Judgment of God, who would not suffer him to enjoy the Fruits of that Seed which he had sown with so much Malignity *. This Gentleman was of the House of Avalos, by Origin a Catalan, his Ancestors came into Italy with King Alfonso of Aragon, who first of that House conquered the Kingdom of Naples. Since the Battle of Ravenna, in which, while yet a Youth, he was taken Prisoner, he served in all the Wars of the Spaniards in Italy, so that, tho' young in Years, for he was not past Six and Thirty, he was old in Experience, ingenious, courageous, very diligent, and very crafty, and in vast Credit and Favour with the Spanish Soldiers, of which he had been a long Time

* The Marquis of Pescara was of the Davala Family in New Castile, near Toledo, rather antient than illustrious. He died of a lingering Consumption, occasioned by his continual drinking of Water, and the many Fatigues and Watchings that he endured in the Wars. He was buried at Milan, November 30, 1525, and afterwards carried to Naples, and interred in the Church of San Domenico.

A. D.
1525.

Time Captain General, whence the Victory of Pavia, and all the memorable Exploits performed by that Army for the Space of some Years, were principally owing to his Counsel and Conduct. He was a General certainly of great Worth, but one who knew very well by his Artifices and Dissimulation how to promote and increase his own Interest, was also haughty, treacherous, malicious, void of Sincerity, and worthy, as he often used to wish, of having Spain for his native Country rather than Italy. His Death then occasioned considerable Confusion in that Army, with which he was in such great Favour and Reputation, and put others in Hopes that it might be destroyed with much greater Ease, since it was deprived of a General of such great Worth and Authority. Those Powers, therefore, who were desirous that a League should be made, were so much the warmer and more importunate in their Instances with the Pontiff. But on the other hand his Doubts and Suspensions were equivalent, and justly; for very persuasive Arguments offered themselves on both Sides of the Question, ^{A. D. 1525.} sufficient to puzzle and perplex a Man however warm and resolute, and much more Clement, who always proceeded slowly and with Deliberation in his Affairs.
 very

It was no longer expected that Cæsar would take any Resolution for the Security of Italy, he seemed very intent on making himself Master of the Castle of Milan, which being taken, all the other Powers, and especially the Pope, whose State was but weak, and situated in the Midst between Lombardy and the Kingdom of Naples, would manifestly become his Prey. And supposing it should lie in his Power to oppress him, it was much to be doubted whether he would not make use of it, either out of Ambition, which is in a manner natural to Emperors against Popes, or for his own Security, or to revenge himself, as he was reasonably supposed to be full of Indignation and Distrust on account of the Plot carried on with the

the

A. D. the Marquis of Pescara; and tho' the 1525. Necessity of providing against that Danger was great, yet the Foundation and Hopes of being enabled to accomplish it did not appear to be slight, so that either the Remedy must succeed by means of so potent a League and Conjunction, or the Case must be thought desperate for ever. The Government of France promised Five Hundred Lances, and to contribute, every Month during the War, Forty Thousand Ducats, with which it was proposed to hire a Body of Ten Thousand Swiss. It was designed that the Pope and Venetians together should bring into the Field Eighteen Hundred Men at Arms, Twenty Thousand Foot, and Two Thousand Light Horse: The French and Veneti- ans were to put to Sea a large Fleet, for attacking either Genoa or the Kingdom of Naples. Madam the Regentess promised to open the Campaign, without Delay, with a numerous Army on the Frontiers of Spain, that so Cæsar might be prevented from sending Troops for maintaining the War in Italy. The Cæsarean

Design of the Princes formed against
Cæsar.

Cæſarean Army that remained in Lombardy was not great, had no Generals of Authority as formerly, the Marquis being dead, and Bourbon and the Vice-roy in Spain, it had no Means of raiſing Money, and did not abound with Proviſions, was extreainly hated by the People, from a Deſire of their Duke, and the intolerable Exactions of the Soldiers, both in the City of Milan, and throughout the State; the Caſtles of Milan and Cremona were in the Hands of the Duke, and the Venetians gave Hopes that the Duke of Ferrara would alſo enter into this Confederacy, provided Clement would be content to grant him Reggio, of which City the Duke was determined at any Rate to keep Poſſeſſion.

A. D.

1525.

ON the other Side Difficulties aroſe from the Cunning and Valour of the Enemies, from their being accuſtomed to maintain themſelves for a long Time, when Neceſſity required, with a little Money, and to put up with many Wants and Inconveniencies; the Towns
in

A. D. in their Possession were fortified, and, ^{1525.} from their Situation in a Plain, easy to have their Fortifications repaired, and strengthened with new Works; in these they might maintain themselves till Succours arrived from Germany, of such a Nature as to reduce the whole War to the Fortune of one Battle. The Troops of the League could be no other than new-raised Men, and of small Value in comparison of that veteran Army, flushed with so many Victories. It was difficult to fix on a Captain General, for the Marquis of Mantoua, at that time General of the Venetians, was not equal to so great a Charge, nor could it with any Security be intrusted in the Hands of the Duke of Ferrara, or of the Duke of Urbino, who had received so many Injuries that it was impossible for them to be pleased with the Pope's Greatness. The Weapons of the Church had naturally blunt Edges, and those of the Venetians were no keener, and if each were but a bad Cutter when alone
and

and acting separately, what could be A. D. expected when employed in Conjunction! ^{1525.} In the Armies of the League there never would be a Concurrence of all the necessary Provisions at one Time; for amidst so great a Variety of Wills, where are different Interests, and different Ends, there will be apt to arise Disorders, Indignation, Resentments and Distrust, and, at best, you will never find among them that Promptness and Alacrity for vigorously pursuing the Favour of Fortune when she shews herself kind, nor a firm Disposition to make a resolute and constant Resistance when she looks upon them with a frowning Aspect. But, that which above all occasioned the greatest Difficulty and Fear in this Resolution, was an Apprehension that the French, whenever Cæsar, on finding himself straitened, should offer to release their King, would not only break off from the League, but assist him against the Confederates. And tho' the King of England passed his royal Word for them that they should come to no Agreement, and it was proposed that

A. D. that they should give Security in Rome, 1525. Florence, or Venice, for three Months Payments, yet no Means were found to remove that Suspicion: For the French having no other End than the Recovery of their King, and it being well known that they had no Inclination to a War, but when they had no Hopes of an Agreement, it seemed probable that, whenever it pleased Cæsar to consent to their Wishes, they would prefer an Accommodation with him to all other Interests and Regards; nay further, every one was sensible that the greater the Preparations and Forces of the League should appear, the more would Cæsar shew himself inclined to agree with the King of France, and therefore it seemed a very dangerous Step to engage in a War in which the Powerful Forces of the Confederates might do as much Hurt as Good. With these Reasons was the Pontiff plyed on all Sides, by the Ambassadors of the Princes, and no less by his own Ministers, for there was a Division in his Family and in his Council, where every one favoured his own Inclination.

Inclination, with so much the less Respect, as the Authority which they had arrogated with him was the greater; for he had till this Time suffered himself in a great measure to be carried by those who ought to have paid Obedience to his Nod, and to look upon themselves as no other than Ministers of the Will and Orders of their Master.
To understand this and many other Occurrences, it is necessary to look back on some Transactions of an older Date.

LEO, who brought the chief Ecclesiastical Dignity into the House of the Medici, and with the Authority of the Cardinalship so well sustained himself and that Family, which was fallen from the Height of Grandeur to so low a State of Decay, that it had reason to expect a Vicissitude and Return of prosperous Fortune, was a Man of consum-mate Liberality, if it be proper to give that Name to a Profuseness in Expences that passes all Bounds and Measures.
After his Assumption to the Pontificate he displayed so much Magnificence and Vol. VIII. Z Splen-

A. D. Splendor, with a truly Royal Spirit, as 1525. would have been surprising even in one who had descended by long Succession from Kings and Emperors. Nor was he only most profuse of Money, but of all Favours which are at the Disposal of a Pope, which he bestowed so unmeasurably that he brought the Spiritual Authority into Contempt, disordered the Oeconomy of the Court, and by his excessive Expences brought himself under a Necessity of perpetually contriving to raise Money by extraordinary Means.
To this so remarkable an Easiness was added a most profound Dissimulation, with which he circumvented every one in the Beginning of his Pontificate, and made himself pass for a very good Prince; I dare not say of an Apostoli-cal Goodness, for in our corrupt Times the Goodness of a Pontiff is commended when it does not surpass the Wickedness of other Men; but he was reputed merciful, desirous of doing Good to all, and quite averse from every Thing that might give Offence to any Person. Among other good Gifts of Fortune, which were were very great, he was so happy ^{A. D.} as to have about him *Giulio de' Me- ^{1525.} dici, his Cousin, whom from a Knight of Rhodes, tho' illegitimate, he raised to the Cardinalship. For Giulio being naturally grave, diligent, assiduous in Business, averse from Pleasures, temperate and thrifty in every Thing, and having in his Hands, by Appointment of Leo, the Management of all the important Affairs of the Pontificate, restrained and moderated many Disorders proceeding from his Profuseness and Easiness; and, what is more, not following the Customs of other Nephews and Brothers of Popes, but preferring the Honour and Grandeur of Leo to the Consideration of making a comfortable Provision to support himself after his Death, he approved himself a most faithful and most obedient Minister to him, in such a manner that it seemed as if he were really his second Self. On these accounts he was continually more and more promoted by the Pope, and still more and more entrusted with Business, which, in the Hands of two Per-*

A. D. 1525. sons of such different Natures, is a Demonstration how well the Mixture of two Contraries may sometimes agree together; as here, for Instance, Assiduity, Diligence, Conduct, and Gravity of Manners, with Indolence, Prodigality, and an inordinate Love of Pleasure and Mirth. This Management made it believed by many that Leo was governed by Giulio, and that he himself was not a Man qualified to undertake so great a Charge, but of a harmless Disposition, unwilling to hurt any Body, and very glad to enjoy the Sweets of the Pontificate; and that, as a Contrast, Giulio was full of Spirit, Ambition, and a Desire of Innovations. Hence all the Severities, all the Movements, and all the Enterprises that happened during the Time of Leo were imagined to proceed from the Instigation of Giulio, who was reputed of a malignant Temper, but a Man of Parts, and of a great Spirit. This Opinion of his Merit was confirmed and increased after the Death of Leo, for, amidst all the Opposition and Difficulties with which he was surrounded, ed, he supported his Affairs with such A. D.

 Dignity, that he appeared almost like a 1525.
 Pope, and preserved his Authority with many of the Cardinals to such a Degree, that he entered into Two Conclaves absolute Master of Sixteen Votes, and at last after the Death of Adrian, in spite of the infinite Contradictions and Oppositions of the greater Part and of the senior Members of the College, he made his way to the Pontificate, not full Two Years from the Decease of Leo, entering on his Office with such high Expectations, that it was the universal Opinion he would be the greatest Pontiff, and perform the greatest Actions that had ever been performed by any one who had hitherto sat in the Papal Chair. But it was soon known what vain Judgments they had formed of Leo and of him ; for Clement had many Qualities different from what was at first imagined of him, since he had nothing of that ambitious Desire of Novelties, nor was endowed with that Greatness of Soul, and Inclination of Mind to generous and magnanimous

A. D. 1525. Ends, as the Public had at first believed; and it appeared that he had been with Leo rather a Minister and Executor of his Designs, than a Director and Introducer of his Counsels and Will: And tho' he had a very capacious Understanding, and a wonderful Knowledge of all public Affairs, yet his Resolution and Execution were by no means answerable; for being hindered, not only by a remarkable Timorousness of Mind, and by a Desire to save Expences, but also by a kind of Irresolution and Perplexity, which was natural to him, he stood almost continually in Suspense and Ambiguity, when he was brought to a Determination of such Affairs as he had oftentimes foreseen at a Distance, considered, and in a manner settled. Hence it happened, that, both in his resolving as well as executing what he had resolved, every trifling Concern that just then discovered itself to him, every slight Impediment that came athwart his Way, appeared sufficient to make him relapse into the same Confusion in which he had stood hesitating ting before he had resolved, as he al- ^{A. D.} ways fancied, after he had taken a Re- ^{1525.} solution, that the Counsel which he had rejected was the best: For, representing to himself at the present Instant only those Reasons which he had neglected, he never recalled to Examination those which had moved him to make his Choice, by the Clashing and Comparison of which the opposite Reasons would have their Force weakened; nor could the Memory of his been often under the Power of vain Fears teach him to avoid giving way to such Weakness for the future.

 In this intangled Situation, and confused Manner of Proceeding, suffering himself to be often biassed by his Ministers, he seemed rather led than counselled by them.

OF the Ministry those who had a ^{Two lead-} mighty Interest with him were Nicolas ^{ing Mini-} Schomberg, a German, and Gian Matteo ^{sters of} Giberto, a Genoeſe; the former revered, ^{Pope Cle-} and in a manner feared by the Pontiff; ^{ment.} the other very acceptable, and greatly Z 4 beloved

A. D. 1525. beloved by him; Schomberg, following the Authority of Girolamo Savonarola, entered himself, while he studied the Law, in the Order of Preaching Friars, but afterwards, relinquishing his Convent, tho' retaining the Name and Habit, he applied himself to secular Business. Giberto was dedicated to a monastic Life in his Childhood, but afterwards leaving his Cloister, by his Father's Authority, tho' he was but a Bastard, quite abdicated his Profession, with the Name and Habit.

At variance.

THESE two Ministers, while they agreed together when Giulio was but a Cardinal, and afterwards in the Beginning of his Pontificate, guided him at their Discretion; but since, falling at Variance, either out of Ambition, or from a Difference of Tempers, they put all Things in Confusion, and ruined his Affairs. For Friar Nicolas, on account of a national Tye, or for some other Respect, being devoted to the Interest of Cæsar, and by Nature obstinately attached to his own Opinions, which were often different from those of others, so immoderately favoured the Cause of Cæsar, that he was often suspected by the Pontiff as one who had more Concern for the Interests of others than for those of his Master. The other in truth knew no other Patron, or Object of his Affection, than the Pontiff; but, being naturally eager and vehement in the Management of his Affairs, tho', in the Time of Leo, he had been a most bitter Enemy to the French, and a Favourer of Cæsar's Cause, yet since his Death he was become quite the contrary. Hence those two Ministers, who bore the greatest Sway with the Pontiff, being at open Variance, and not proceeding with Maturity, or with any Regard to the Honour of their Master, but exposing his Coldness and Irresolution to all the Court, rendered him contemptible and in a manner ridiculous to the Generality of Mankind. As he was then by Nature irresolute, and those whose Duty it was to assist him in coming to a Determination on so difficult and perplexed an Affair helped
were

A. D. 1525. ed only to increase his Doubts and Confusion, he knew not which Way to turn himself. At last, rather from a Necessity of coming to some Determination, than out of a manly Resolution, or firm Judgment, especially as he found himself in such a Situation that to come to no Determination was a kind of Determination, he inclined to make a League and to join with the others in beginning a War with Cæsar.

Errera
arrives at Rome
from
Cæsar.

THEY had agreed on Articles, which were drawn up in Writing, and only wanted to be signed, when the Pope received Advice that the Commendatory Errera was arrived at Genoa, deputed to him from Cæsar, and coming with all Diligence would soon be at Rome with good and gracious Dispatches. He resolved therefore to wait his Arrival, tho' with very heavy Complaints from the Ambassadors, to whom he had given strong assurances of signing the Confederacy the same Day. Errera was sent on this Message because Cæsar, after he had given such a Commission to the Marquis

Marquis of Pescara as gave him full A. D. Power at least to seize on the State of ^{1525.} Milan, doubting that such a Step would occasion new Movements in Italy, carried on with great Application the Negotiations for an Agreement with the Legate Salviati, so that a Capitulation was made between them, with a Reserve however on Condition of its Ratification by the Pontiff. By this Agreement Provision was made for the Restitution of Reggio and Rubiera, and there was included in it the Defence and Preservation of the Duke of Milan, which were the principle Points that Clement desired, but with one express Condition that, in case of his Death, Cæsar should neither keep that Dutchy for himself, nor give it to his Brother the Archduke, but invest with it M. de Bourbon, whom, together with George, the natural Brother of Maximilian Cæsar, the Pontiff himself, at the persuasion of the Archbishop of Capua, had been so inconsiderate as to propose at the Time when Francesco Sforza lay so ill that every one despaired of his Life.

A. D.

1525.

Cæsar obtains a Dispensation for his Marriage.

THE Capitulation being made the Legate, without waiting for Clement's Ratification, could not, or knew not how to deny giving Cæsar the Brief of Dispensation, that he so much desired, which having been drawn before with an Expression only of the Impediment in the second Degree, without nominating the Daughter of the King of Portugal, for the sake of giving the less Offence to the King of England, or because, there being a double Tye of Kindred between them, Mention had been made only of the stronger Tye, it was necessary to draw up another, which should comprehend all the Impediments, together with an express Nomination of the Persons. The Commendatory Errera set out from Cæsar's Court with the Dispatches of this Confederacy a Day or two after Cæsar had received Advice of the Imprisonment of Morone, and on the sixth of December, being conducted before the Pope, besides many Offers, and most ample Protestations of the good Disposition sition of Cæsar, presented him with the A. D.

 Articles of the Capitulation; and tho' ^{1525.} those Articles that concerned the Salt, and the beneficial Matters in the Kingdom of Naples were different from those which had been concluded with the Viceroy, yet because the principal Point which he had in View was to free himself from Suspicions, he would have accepted them had he been convinced of the Sincerity of the Proceedings in relation to the Duke of Milan: But since, in the Article that related to Francesco ^{Pope's Ex-} Sforza, there was no Mention made of ^{ceptions} what had been laid to his Charge, nor ^{to the} any Promise to restore the State of ^{Treaty} which he had been deprived, nor of ^{with} pardoning the Errors which he had ^{Cæsar.} committed, but on the contrary Cæsar, in the Conclusion made with the Le-gate, and in the Instructions given to this his Agent, had not given the least Indication that he knew any Thing of it, one might easily comprehend the Subtleties and Artifices of his Ministers.
 For the Confederacy, and the Promise to defend and preserve Francesco Sforza
 in

A. D. in the Dutchy of Milan, did not deprive Cæsar of the Power of proceeding against him as his Vassal, and of declaring the Fief devolved on account of the Charge of his having conspired against his Majesty; and Bourbon, who was substituted in case of his Death, would also succeed him on his Deprivation, because the Laws consider a civil Death as equivalent to a natural, and he, they say, who is condemned for a Crime of that Nature, is dead in Law. The Pope therefore very gravely answered, that he had no private Cause of Disagreement with Cæsar, but, on the contrary, in all Differences and Disputes that might happen between them, he would never chuse any other judge than him; but that it was also necessary to settle the public Affairs on such a Foundation as might put Italy in a State of Security, which could not be effected without once more restoring the Dutchy of Milan to Francesco Sforza. He shewed him also the Reasons why this Article, so generally worded was not satisfactory, concluding that he should be extremely treably mortified to find himself under A. D. a Necessity of taking new Resolutions, ¹⁵²⁵ and to break off from Cæsar, to whom he had always been most firmly attached.

THE WARS IN ITALY. 367

To this the Duke of Sessa replied, ^{Duke of} that Cæsar was very sincere in his In- ^{Sessa's} tentions, and was doubtless contented ^{Reply.} that, notwithstanding what had happened, the Dutchy of Milan should remain in the Possession of Francesco Sforza; but that, through Inadvertency, the Article had not been drawn up in ample Form, but the Pope might make what Corrections or Alterations in it he saw fit; that he promised him the Ratification within the Term of Two Months, provided that his Holiness would also promise that, during that Time on his Part, he would not conclude the League he was negotiating with France and the Venetians.

EVERY one easily perceived that this Offer had no other Foundation than a Desire to gain Time by a Delay of Two

A. D. Two Months, for Cæſar the better to 1525. regulate his Reſolutions, and to provide himſelf with Remedies againſt ſo formidable an Union. The Pontiff, however, after many Diſputes, to the very great Diſpleaſure of the other Ambaſſadors, conſented to this Demand, as well out of a Deſire to defer, as long as he could, the involving himſelf in Expences and Troubles, as becauſe it appeared to him a very dangerous Step to contract an Alliance with the King's Mother while he himſelf was a Priſoner, it lying in the Power of Cæſar to diſſolve it whenever he pleaſed, and this Delay might poſſibly, tho' he ſaw but little Hopes, being about the Accompliſhment of his deſired Ends; and tho' it ſhould occaſion an Agreement between the two Kings, he profoundly conſidered, tho' others were of a contrary Judgment that it was beſt to have it effected at a Time when Cæſar was under leſs Neceſſity, becauſe the better ſhould be the Situation of his Affairs, the harder would be the Conditions that he would propoſe to the King of France, the Rigour

Rigour of which gave Hopes that the King, after he should be released, would not think himself bound to observe them. It was also inserted in this Treaty that at the same time no new Works should be raised, or any Thing farther undertaken against the Castle of Milan, provided Francesco Sforza would oblige himself not to annoy or molest the Troops that lay before it; which Condition he would not accept.

THUS ended the Year of the Nativity^{1526.} of the Son of God Almighty 1525, with Dispositions rather for War than for Peace, and we are now entering on 1526, a Year full of great Events, and surprising Commotions. In the Beginning of it Errera returning to Cæsar, the Pope writ a long Letter to that Prince, with his own Hand, in which neither wholly denying nor confessing the Plot formed against him, but laying the Fault on the Marquis of Pescara, he endeavoured to excuse Francesco Sforza, who, if he had committed any Error, was seduced by the Counsels of

A. D. Girolamo Morone; intreating him also ^{1526.} in the most pathetic Manner, that, for the Quiet and Benefit of all Christendom, he would prevail with himself to pardon him.

CÆSAR, at that Time, in Expectation of the Pontiff's Answer, put a Stop to all Negotiations with others; and tho' Bourbon, who was pretty much carested and confirmed in his Hopes of the Affinity, insisted on the Celebration of the Nuptials, he was put off with an Excuse that Cæsar was willing first to solemnise his Marriage with his Portuguese Spouse, who was every Day expected: But this Delay was designed to leave Room for making an Accommodation with the King of France, in which it was proposed to give him the same Lady in Matrimony as had been promised to Bourbon, Interest, as it is customary with all Princes, being preferred before Honour and Honesty. Cæsar had solemnised his Nuptials at Seville, when Errera arrived from Rome, with the Minutes of a very long Article drawn up up by the Pope in favour of Francesco Sforza. Wherefore Cæsar, being certified also that the Legate had no Commission but what concerned the Contents of that Article, and his whole Council concurring in the Opinion that it was necessary to break the League that was in Agitation, and dangerous to have so many Enemies to deal with at once, found himself reduced to a Necessity, either of satisfying the Pope and the Venetians by restoring Francesco Sforza, or to agree with the King of France. That King at last, after many Disputes about Burgundy, finding no hopes of obtaining from Cæsar his Liberty on any other Conditions, offered to restore that Province, together with its Appurtenances and Dependencies, and to yield up his Rights and Pretensions to the Kingdom of Naples and Dutchy of Milan, and to give his Two Sons as Hostages for the Performance of his Engagements.

THE WARS IN ITALY. 371

A. D.
1526.

Offers of the King
of France.

A. D.

1526.

VERY warm were the Debates on the Choice of either of the Expedients : The Viceroy, who had conducted the most Christian King into Spain, and had given him such great Hopes, and so ardently solicited his Deliverance, more earnestly insisted on it than ever ; and his Authority, with regard only to his Fidelity and Good Will, had great Weight with Cæsar. But his Counsel was opposed, rather with exclaiming than disputing against it, by Mercurio di Gattinara, the Great Chancellor, a Man who, tho' born of low Parentage in Piedmont, was yet of great Credit and Experience, and had for several Years the Management of the important Business of that Court. These two great Men one Day assisting in Council, and Cæsar being present, in order to put a final Determination to an Affair that had been under Debate so many Months, the Great Chancellor spoke thus :

A. D.

1526.

“ I HAVE been always under Apprehensions, most invincible Cæsar, that our excessive Desires, and immoderate Views would be the Cause that in the End we should reap neither Honour nor Profit from so great and famous a Victory; but I did not however imagine that the coming off Conquerors would endanger your Reputation and your State, which I now plainly see is like to be the Result. For we have now under Debate the making an Agreement, by which all Italy may be thrown into Despair, and the King of France set at Liberty, but on such burdensome Conditions, that, if not by Inclination, yet at least out of Necessity, he may become a greater Enemy to us than he was before. I could wish, as heartily as others, that at the same time Burgundy might be recovered, and the Foundations laid for the subjecting Italy; but I know that he who is thus hasty in grasping so much is in Danger of holding fast nothing, and that no Reason

A. D. 1526. } son requires that the King of France, after he is set at Liberty, should fulfil his Engagements to you, in such important Articles. Does he not know that if he restores to you Burgundy he opens you a Gate of France? and that it will be in your power to make Incur-sions as far as Paris? and that, when you have the Means of annoying France on so many Quarters, it will be impossible for him to resist you? Does he not know, and every one else, that his consenting that you should go to Rome armed, that you should put a Bridle on Italy, and that you should reduce the spiritual and temporal State of the Church to your Devotion, would be the Cause of doubling your Power? and that you never can want for Money nor Arms to molest him, and that he must be necessitated to accept all the Laws you shall please to impose on him? Who then can believe that he will think himself bound to an Agreement, by which he may become your Slave, and you his Lord? Can he want for the Complaints and Exclamations of the whole Kingdom of France, the Persuasions of the King of England, and the Stimulations of all Italy? The Love perhaps that subsists between you two will be the Cause that he will repose Confidence in you, and willingly see the Increase of your Power; or were there ever two Princes between whom there were more Grounds for Hatred and Contention? Here is not only an Emulation of Greatness, which uses to put Weapons in the Hands of Brothers against one another, but antient and very bitter Enmities, commenced from the Times of the Fathers and Grandfathers of your Grandfathers, so many Wars long carried on between these two Houses, so many Treaties of Peace and Agreement not observed, so many Injuries and Affronts given and received. Can we chuse but believe that he burns with Indignation to reflect that he has been for so many Months your Prisoner, kept under so strict a Guard, without ever having had the Favour of being conducted into your Presence? That
and

A. D. in this Prison, thro' Vexation and In-1526. convenience, he had been at Death's Door ; and that he was not now set at Liberty out of Magnanimity or Love, but from the Apprehensions of so formidable an Union against you ? Can we believe that an Affinity contracted by Necessity is of more Force than so many Incentives ? And who knows not what Value Princes set upon these Ties ?
 And where is there better Evidence of the Regard they pay to Affinities than among ourselves ? Some perhaps may fancy that passing his Word, which he will give us for his returning to Prison, may be sufficient for our Security ; but, alas ! what inconsiderate Grounds, what imprudent Hopes would this Consideration suggest for our Reliance ! The extream Grief that affects me, when I find some are for taking so pernicious and dangerous a Resolution, constrains me, Cæsar, to speak my Mind freely.
 We all know but too well what Value is to be set on the Word of Honour, when the Interest of the State is concerned, and what Stress is to be laid on the Promises

THE WARS IN ITALY.

377

Promises of the French, who tho' frank and open in all other Matters, are in this Regard perfect Masters in the Arts of Diffimulation and Deceit, and that their King is by Nature as much deficient in Deeds as he is redundant in Words. We may therefore well conclude that no Benevolence between two Princes, whose Injuries and Hatred descend with their Blood by antient Inheritance; no Faith nor Promises, which in the important Concerns of State have but little Weight with many, and with the French none at all, will induce that King to make good an Agreement, that will exalt his Enemy to Heaven, and bring himself and his Kingdom under manifest Subjection. You would answer I am sensible, that, for Fear of what is here suggested, there is demanded of him Security, in the Persons of two of his Sons, one of them his Eldest, the Love of whom must needs occasion him to set a higher Value on them than on Burgundy. But I am afraid that this Love of his Children will rather have a contrary Effect, when their Memory shall

A. D: 1526.

A. D. shall present itself to his Mind, and he 1526. shall consider that by observing the Agreement he lays a Foundation for making them your Slaves. I know not whether this Pledge would be sufficient, when he should be quite deprived of all Hopes of recovering them any other Way *. For it is a Matter of too serious Concern to endanger his Kingdom, which once lost is very difficult to be recovered; but he might well hope to recover his Sons with Time, or by Agreement, or on some other Occasion, and the Delay will be less troublesome on account of their tender Age. But having found Means to bring almost all the Christian Princes to unite with him against you, who doubts but he will enter into close Confederacy with them, and seek to moderate the Agreement by Force of Arms, and that the Fruits we shall reap from the Victory will be a very

* He doubts whether the King's Children be a sufficient Pledge for restoring Burgundy, supposing that the King had no other way to recover them, because such a Restitution would open a Door of France, as before observed.

very vigorous and dangerous War, excited by Hatred, Necessity and Desperation, from the King of England, King of France, and all Italy? from all which we should be able to defend ourselves, would it please God not to slacken his Hand in working for us every Day those Miracles which he has so often wrought for us till this present Time ; and if Fortune should change her Nature in our Behalf, and her Inconstancy and Mutability should become towards us an Example of Stability and Constancy, contrary to all the Examples of past Events. We have in all our Counsels, for so many Months together, concluded that we are to use our utmost Endeavours that the Italians might not join with the Government of France ; and now we precipitate ourselves into a Resolution which removes all the Difficulties that have hitherto kept them in Suspence, that multiplies our Dangers, that multiplies the Forces of the Enemy : For who knows not how much more potent a League will be which shall have for its Head the King of France, than

A. D.
1526.

A. D.
1526.

than one made with the Government of France while the King remains your Prisoner? Who knows not that no Cause has hitherto held the Pope in Ambiguity and Hesitation from confederating against you, but the Fears that you may separate the French from them by offering them their King? That they will fear less, when we shall have his Children and not him? Thus the Remedy which we provide for avoiding the Danger will, without Comparison, do more Hurt than Good, and increase the Evil, and, instead of breaking that Union, we shall ourselves be the Instruments of rendering it more firm and powerful. It will be said to me, What is then your Opinion? Is it your Advice that we reap no Profit from so great a Victory? Are we to remain continually in this State of Perplexity? I confirm what I have often said, that it is very pernicious to take in more Food at one Time than the Stomach is able to digest, and that it is necessary for us to regain the Friendship of Italy, which demands nothing of us but its Security, rity, and to endeavour to obtain of the French King Burgundy, with whatever else should be possible for us; or otherwise to make an Agreement with him, by which Italy may be left to our Discretion, but so mild and moderate with regard to his Interests that he may have Reason to observe it. And in making a Choice between these two Ways it is requisite, Cæsar, that your Prudence and Goodness should prefer what is stable and juster to that which at first Sight may perhaps appear more profitable and grand. The State of Milan I confess, is richer, and more convenient on many accounts than that of Burgundy, and there is no Friendship to be contracted with the Italians but by leaving Milan in the Hands of Francesco Sforza, or of some other who shall content the Pope. And yet I much prefer taking this Course to an agreement with the French, because Burgundy is more yours in Justice than Milan, and easier to keep than the other, where you have not a single Person that is well affected to you. To attempt the 1526.

Resto-

A. D.

A. D. Restoration of Burgundy, your antient 1526. Inheritance, is highly commendable : To aspire after Milan, either for yourself or one who shall wholly depend on you, discovers some Marks of Ambition.
 The first is requir'd of you by the Memory of so many of your glorious Progenitors, whose Bones interred in Captivity cry for nothing but to be delivered and removed by you, and their so just, compassionate, and holy Prayers are perhaps the Cause of rendering God the more propitious to you. It is a more prudent as well as more feasible Resolution to seek to establish a Friendship with one who unwillingly becomes an Enemy, than with him who cannot possibly at any time be your Friend. For in the King of France will never harbour any other than Hatred, and a malicious Desire to oppose your Designs : But the Pope and the other Powers of Italy, as soon as the Army is removed from Lombardy, being freed from Jealousies, will have no Occasion to contend with you either from Fear or Emulation, but remaining your steady Friends you will now

now and always enjoy the Convenience A. D. and Profit of their good Correspondence. ^{1526.}

You are invited therefore to chuse that Friendship by Honour, Utility, and Security, and, if I deceive not myself, no less by Necessity. For, even supposing that you should make an Agreement with the King on no other Obligation than of assisting you in your Enterprize on Italy, it does not appear to me probable that he will fulfil it, because he will imagine that his leaving Italy to be your Prey will too much endanger his own Kingdom. And, on the other hand, he will appear to himself to have vast Opportunities and Hopes, by means of so potent an Union, to create you much Trouble and Uneasiness, and to reduce you to an Agreement on less burdensome Conditions. Thus of a King Prisoner we shall make him free, and our Enemy, and shall give a Head to the Kingdom of France, that, in Conjunction with so many others, he may make War upon us with more Forces, and with greater Advantage. How much better is it to agree with the Italians!

to

A. D. 1526. to enter into a firm and sincere Alliance with the Pontiff, who has continually desired it, and to deprive the French of all Hopes of a Conjunction with the Italians; for in such a Case not Necessity, nor the Fears of new Leagues, but your own Will, and the Quality of the Conditions will be sufficient to draw you to an Agreement with the French; then you will see that Want and Despair will force them not only to restore Burgundy, and to make you greater Offers, but also to put into your Hands such Security as shall leave no Room to doubt of the Performance of their Engagements; since the Children are not sufficient to secure you while they can feed themselves with Hopes of so considerable a Conjunction, and if they were to make an Addition of Bayonne, Narbonne, and the Fleet, it would hardly be enough to warrant their Observance. In this Manner you will be sure to reap great, honourable, just, and secure Fruits from your Victory; otherwise, either I have no Understanding at all in any Affair, or this Agreement ment will so endanger your State, that A. D. 1526.

 I know not what will secure it if the Imprudence of the King of France proves no greater than ours."

THE Great Chancellor by this accurate and vehement Speech, and by the Reputation of his Wisdom, had affected the Minds of a great Part of the Council, when the Viceroy, who was the Author of the contrary Opinion, spoke, as it is said, in the following Manner.

"IT is undoubtedly true, most glorious Cæsar, that the Man who, out of a greedy Desire of having too much, aims at grasping more than he can hold fast, is by no means to be commended; but then he is no less to be blamed who, from a needless Suspicion and Distrust, voluntarily deprives himself of vast Opportunities, acquired with a Multitude of Difficulties and Dangers. The Errors are indeed very considerable on both Sides; but a Fault that proceeds from a Timidity and Meanness of Spi-

Speech of the Viceroy of Naples in Answer to the foregoing.

A. D. rit is more inexcusable in so great a 1526. Prince, than that which arises from a certain Generosity and Greatness of Mind ; and it is more laudable to seek with Danger the Acquisition of too much, than, for the sake of avoiding Danger, to let slip and vanish the rarest Opportunities that a Man is blest with. Now this however is in effect the Counsel of the Chancellor, who doubting that this Agreement will not procure both Burgundy and Milan (for we are by no means to suspect that he is under the Influence of a Love to Italy, his Country, or of the Good Will that he bears to the Duke of Milan) proposes a Way by which, according to him, you gain Burgundy and lose Milan, a State without Comparison of the greater Importtance, but, according to me, by which you lose Milan without gaining Burgun- dy ! And thus, where this Victory has most gloriously opened you a Way to the Lordship of all Christendom, there will remain nothing for us, if we follow his Advice, but Loss and Disgrace. And indeed I see no Safety in his Counsel, but

but rather very great Danger attended ^{A. D. 1526.} with very small Advantage, which besides may easily slip out of our Hands. But, on the contrary, an Agreement with the King of France appears to me attended with very great Glory, very great Profit, and sufficient Security. For I would ask you, Chancellor, what Reason have you, what Security, what Promise, that the Italians, after we shall have evacuated the Dutchy of Milan, will take care not to violate the Agreement, nor intermeddle between the King of France and us? And not rather that, after we shall have debased our Reputation, after we shall have disbanded that Army, which is a Bridle on their Malice, after they shall be secured from the Coming of new Bodies of Germans into Italy, because there will be no Place in Lombardy to receive them, nor where they can shelter themselves; what Security, I say, have you that the Italians, at such a Time, continuing their Plots, besides threatening the Kingdom of Naples, which will remain in a manner at their Discretion, will not make

A. D. an Effort to deliver the King of France?

1526.

Have you any Trust, Chancellor, in the Gratitude of Francesco Sforza, who, after so many Benefits, has requited you, O Cæsar, with such base Treachery? What will he not do now, when he has been made sensible that you are desirous to punish so heinous a Piece of Iniquity with Justice? now, that he fears Punishment from you, and expects Safety from our Enemies? Have you any Confidence, Chancellor, in the Friendship of the Venetians, who are both Enemies to the Empire and to the House of Austria, and trembling at remembering that as it were but yesterday your Grandfather Maximilian bereaved them of so many of those Town which they now possess? Have you any Faith in the Goodness of Clement, or in his Inclination to the Emperor? the Motive of Leo's Alliance with Cæsar, after he had attempted many Things against us, was a Desire of Revenge, or of Security from the French, or an ambitious Design of seizing on Ferrara. After the Death of Leo, this Man, hated
by

by Half the World, continued our A. D.
1526.
 Friend out of Necessity; but after he was made Pope, immediately returning to the Nature of the Pontiffs, which is to fear and hate the Emperors, he has nothing in more Detestation than the Name of Cæsar. All these Parties excuse themselves by pretending that their Plots and Devices proceeded not from Hatred, or from any other Passion, but only from a Jealousy of your Greatness, which ceasing all their Machinations have ceased with it. This is either not true, or, tho' it might perhaps have been true in the Beginning, it is necessary that it must have since taken other Roots, and become another Passion; for it is natural for Jealousy to be followed by Hatred, and by Injuries, attended by a Conjunction and Intimacy with the Encmies of the injured Person, together with Designs not only of being secured from his Resentment, but also of profiting by his Ruin, the Memory of Injuries being greater without doubt, and more implacable in him who does, than in him who receives them. Wherefore

A. D.
1526. granting that in the Beginning they might be incited only by Jealousy, the same would have been the Cause of making them become your Enemies, of diverting their Inclinations, and placing their Hopes on the French Side, and afterwards of beginning, as they have done in all the Conventions which they have negotiated, to divide the Kingdom of Naples among themselves. And now whatever Security we give them, or whatever Agreement we make with them, the same Passions of Hatred and Fear will always remain kindled in their Breasts; and putting no Faith in what they imagine extorted from you by Necessity, but thinking they may with the greater Facility bend us to a Compliance with their Will, apprehensive also that at last there will be an Appointment between us and the King of France, like to that made at Cambray, and desirous, to use their own Words, of freeing Italy from the Barbarians, they will have the Boldness to think of prescribing Laws to you, and to demand the Deliverance of the King of France. If you

you should deny their Demands, Cæsar, ^{A. D.} how will you defend the Kingdom of ^{1526.} Naples against them? If you should grant it, you lose all the Fruits of the Victory, and remain the most dishonoured, the most debased of all Princes. But let us grant that Italy would be disposed to observe the Agreement, and that you would be under a Necessity either of relinquishing Milan, or of not recovering Burgundy, what Comparison is there between one Side and the other? Burgundy is a little Province, of small Revenues, and besides not of such mighty Conveniency as many persuade themselves. The Dutchy of Mi- lan, for the Riches and Beauty of so many noble Cities, for the Number and Quality of its Subjects, for the Greatness of its Revenues, and for its Capacity of subsisting all the Armies in the World, is superior to many Kingdoms. But tho' it be so large and so powerful, yet the Conveniencies that arise from its Acquisition are more to be valued than the Country in itself considered: For while Milan and Naples are at your Devoti-

A. D.

1526.

on, the Pontiffs must of necessity, as they used formerly, depend on the Emperors. All Tuscany, the Duke of Ferrara, and the Marquis of Mantoua may be subjected to you: The Venetians, surrounded by Lombardy and Germany, will be obliged to accept your Laws. Thus, I do not say with Arms or with Armies, but with the Reputation of your Name, with a Herald alone, with the Imperial Ensigns you will command all Italy. And who knows not what is Italy? A Country, for the Commodiousness of its Situation, for the Temperateness of the Air, for the Multitude and Ingenuity of its Inhabitants, who are extremely well disposed for all honourable Undertakings, for the Abundance of all Things convenient for human Life, for the Largeness and Beauty of so many most noble Cities, for Riches, for the Seat of Religion, for the ancient Glory of the Empire, and for infinite other Respects, the Queen of all Countries, which if you command, all other Princes will tremble before you. To compass this Design is more conducive ducive to your Greatness, and to the Augmentation of your Glory, and more grateful to the Bones of your Grandfathers (since they too must be called into Council) who, on account of their Goodness and Compassion, must be supposed to desire nothing but what is most convenient for you, and most glorious to your Name. If we follow then the Counsel of the Chancellor we shall lose a very large Acquisition for a small one, and that too very inconsiderable, and besides very uncertain, of which we ought to have taken Warning by what was like to have happened some Months past. Does he not remember, when the King of France, was in such great Danger of Death, in what an uneasy Situation we were, as knowing that by his Death we should lose all the Fruits expected from the Victory? Who can secure us that the same Accident may not possibly intervene at present, and more easily, because the Reliques of the Disorder remain upon him since that Time, and because the Hopes, that have hitherto supported him, being cut off, his

A. D.
1526.

A. D. his Anxiety, which was the Cause of 1526. his Disorder, will return upon him with greater Violence; and especially when, in debating on inextricable Conditions and Security, the new Negotiations must of necessity be spun out to a tedious Length, which will be subject to the same Accident, and perhaps to others as great, and no less dangerous. Don't we know that nothing has so much conduced to keep the Government of France in due Order and Steadiness, as an Expectation of a speedy Release-ment of the King, by which the great Men of that Kingdom have been kept in Quietness and Obedience to the Mother; and that as soon as this Hope should fail, the Kingdom would easily be sensible of it, and the Government would be altered? And when once the Nobles have got the Bridle in Hand, they will take no Care of the King's Liberty, but will rather be pleased with his Captivity, for the Sake of maintaining themselves independant and absolute Lords. Thus instead of Burgundy and of such a Multitude of Acquisitions,
we

we shall no longer have any Thing to expect either from his Imprisonment or Release-ment. But I would ask you farther, Chancellor, is Cæsar in this Resolution to have any Regard to his Dignity and Majesty? Now what greater Disgrace can he incur, what more remarkable Diminution of his Honour, than to be constrained to pardon Fran-cesco Sforza? than that a Man who has one Foot in the Grave, your Rebel, a singular Example of Ingratitude, not by humbling himself and flying to your Mercy, but by throwing himself into the Arms of your Enemies, should force you to yield to him, to restore the State so justly taken from him, and to receive Laws from him? It is better, Cæsar, and more suitable to the Dignity of the Empire, and to your own Greatness, to trust once more to Fortune, and again to hazard every Thing, than, forgetting your Rank, the Authority of a Prince supreme above all other Princes, and the Cæsarcan Name, and the Glory of so many Victories over a most potent King, to accept, from Priests
 and

A. D. and Merchants, Conditions of such a ^{1526.} Nature, that more grievous and more unworthy could not have been imposed, had you been overthrown and conquered. Wherefore, on considering all these Reasons, and how small the Advantage is that can possibly result from an Agreement with the Italians, and by how many Accidents it may easily slip out of our Hands, how unsafe it is to repose Confidence in them, how full of Indignity to abandon the State of Milan, that it is necessary for us to come to a Resolution, and to have for once some Consideration of the End, and that the Imprisonment of the King is of no Service to us, but only on account of the Profits which may be drawn from his Freedom, I have advised, and do advise, that an Agreement be first made with him before you agree with the Italians; which none can deny to be more glorious, more reasonable, and more useful, provided we can secure ourselves of the Observance: And of this I have some Grounds for Hope, both from the Gratitude of the King for

for the Benefit that he will receive A. D. from us, and from the Tie of Affinity, ^{1526.} and also from the Virtues of your Sister, a fit Instrument for maintaining this Friendship, but much more from the Pledge of the two Sons, one of them the First-Born, and the greatest and most important Pledge, I think, that we can possibly receive of him. And, since Necessity constrains us to come to some Resolution, we ought surely to put more Confidence in a King of France with so great a Pledge, than in the Italians with no Pledge at all; to have more Faith in the Word of so great a King, than in the immoderate Covetousness of Priests, or in the suspicious Baseness of Merchants; and we may with more Ease contract, as our Ancestors have often done, an Alliance for some time with the French, than with the Itali- ans, our natural and eternal Enemies.
 Nor do I only see in this Way of proceeding greater Hopes that Faith will be kept with us, but less Danger in case of any Infringement: For tho' the King should not yield you up Bur- gundy,

A. D.
1526. gundy, he will not dare, while his Children remain as Hostages, to give you any further Provocations, but will seek to moderate the Agreement by Negotiations and Intreaties; besides, as he was in a manner but yesterday overcome, and to-day let out of Prison, he will still stand in Awe of your Arms, and never have the Boldness to make another Tryal of your Fortune: And if he does not take up Arms against you, Cæsar, it is certain that all the rest will stand still, till you shall have acquired the Castle of Milan, and confirmed yourself in that State in such a Manner, that you shall no longer have any Thing to fear from the Malice of any Person whatsoever. But as for the Italians, if you should now make an Agreement with them, and they should have a Mind to break it, there will be no Bridle capable of curbing or restraining them; and as their Power of doing you Injuries increases, their Inclination to do them will be more free, and increase in proportion. Wherefore, in my Opinion, it would be the highest Timidity midity and Imprudence to lose, out of ^{A. D.} Jealousy, an Opportunity of making an ^{1526.} Agreement attended with so much Glory, with so much Greatness, and with sufficient Security, and in its Stead to take a Resolution very dangerous, if I mistake not, and very pernicious."

WHEN the Viceroy had done speaking, various were the Opinions of the other Members of the Council, it appearing to all who were of sound Judgment, that to make an Accommodation with the King of France, in the Manner proposed, would be a very dangerous Step. The Flemings, however, were possessed with such a longing Desire of recovering Burgundy, as it was the ancient Patrimony and Title of their Princes, that it would not suffer them to discern the Truth. It was reported also that the large Gifts and Promises of the French had a considerable Influence on many: And above all Cæsar, either because such was his first Inclination, or because the Authority of the Viceroy, especially in conjunction with that

A. D. that of Nansau, who was of the same 1526. Opinion, was of very great Moment, or else because he thought it too much beneath his Dignity to be constrained to pardon Francesco Sforza, willingly hearkened to those who advised an Agreement with the King of France. Hence, after he had ordered the Legate Salvi- ati to be once more sounded whether he would consent that the Dutchy of Milan should be bestowed on the Duke of Bourbon, and was certified that he had no Commission to accept that Expedient, in which Case he would have preferred the Friendship of the Pontiff, he took a Resolution to agree with the King of France, with whom, the chief Points having been already discussed beforehand, and in a manner settled, he came in two or three Days to a Conclusion, without the Intervention of the Pope's Legate in any Matter, Cæsar having before obtained the Consent of the Duke of Bourbon that his Sister promised to him should be married to the King of France. The Duke, it seems, after much Intreaty, had given his

Cæsar chuses to agree with the King
 of France.

his Consent, not so much out of a ^{A. D.} Desire of possessing the Dutchy of Milan, ^{1526.} which was promised him contrary to the Sentiments of the Great Chancellor and of the Viceroy; tho' with the Obligation of heavy Payments, as because his Affairs were reduced to such a Situation, that, neither having nor capable of having, Dependance on any but Cæsar, he was forced to accommodate himself to his Will. As soon as he had given his Consent, that he might avoid appearing at Court at so unseasonable a Time, he set out with all Expedition, by Orders from Cæsar, towards Barcelona, to wait there for the Provisions necessary for his Passage into Italy, which, for want of Ships, there being at that Time no more than three Light Gallies in Spain, and of Money, proceeded but slowly.

THE Contents of the Capitulation, ^{Articles of the Convention on which the French King obtained his Liberty.} stipulated on the Fourteenth of February, in the Year 1526, were in Substance, That between Cæsar and the King of France should be a perpetual Peace, &c.

A. D. 1526. Peace, in which should be comprehended all those who should be nominated by common Consent: That the King of France, on the Tenth Day of March next, should be set at Liberty on his own Borders on the Coast of Fonterabia; and within the Term of Six Weeks following should resign unto Cæsar the Dutchy of Burgundy, the County of Charolois, the Lordship of Noyers, and Chateau Chinon, Dependencies on the said Dutchy, the Viscounty of Aussone, and Le Refort de St. Laurent de la Roche, Dependencies of the Franche Comte, with all the usual Appurtenances of the said Dutchy and Viscounty, all which should for the future be separated and exempt from the Sovereignty of the Kingdom of France: That, at the Time, and at the same Instant the King should be set free, should be delivered into the Hands of Cæsar the Dauphin, and besides him either the Duke of Orleans, the King's Second Son, or twelve of the principal Lords of France, who should be nominated by Cæsar, referring it to the Regentess, either to give the Second Son

Son or the Twelve Barons, and remain as Hostages till Restitution should be made of the said Territories, and the Peace ratified and sworn with all its Articles by the States General of France, and registered (which they call enterined) in all the Parliaments of that Kingdom, with the necessary Formalities, for which was prefixed the Term of Four Months, at which Time the Hostages being restored, Angoulesme, the King's Third Son, should be put into the Hands of Cæsar, to be educated near his Person, for the better cultivating and maintaining the Peace: That the most Christian King should renounce and yield up to Cæsar all his Rights to the Kingdom of Naples, and even those which would have come to him by the Investiture of the Church: That he should make the same Renunciation and Cession of his Rights to the State of Milan, Genoa, Asti, Artois, Arras, Tournay, Lisle, and Doway; that he should restore also the Town and Castle of Hedin, as a Member of the County of Artois, with all the military Stores, Artillery and Mov-ables which were in it when taken last: That he should renounce the Sovereignty of Flanders and of Artois, and of every other Place in the Possession of Cæsar. On the other Side that Cæsar should renounce all Rights to any Place whatsoever in the Possession of the French, and particularly to Peronne, Mondidier, the Counties of Bologne, Guines, and Ponthieu, and to the Towns situated on both Sides of the River Somme: That there should be a League between them, and a perpetual Confederacy for the Defence of their States, with an Obligation of assisting each other, when it should be needful, with Fifteen Hundred Men at Arms, and Ten Thousand Foot: That Cæsar should promise to give Lady Eleonora, his Sister, in Marriage to the most Christian King, to whom, as soon as a Dispensation should be procured from the Pope, she should be betrothed with obligatory Words for the present, and be conducted into France, for solemnising the Matrimony, at the same time that the Hostages, according to the Articles, ticles, were to be restored; and that her Dowry should be Two Hundred Thousand Crowns, with suitable Gifts, one Half to be paid within Sixteen Months, and the other Half afterwards within the Year next ensuing: That between the Dauphin and the Daughter of the King of Portugal by Eleonora, a Marriage should be contracted, as soon as the Parties came of Age: That the King of France should use his utmost Endeavours for inducing the old King of Navarra to yield to Cæsar the Rights of that Kingdom; and, in case of Refusal, the King should give him no Assistance: That the Duke of Guelderland, Count of Zutphen, and the principal Towns of those States should promise, under sufficient Security, to surrender themselves, after his Death, to Cæsar, and that the King should give no Assistance to the Duke of Wirtemberg, nor to Robert de la Marche: That the King should furnish Cæsar, when he had a Mind to pass into Italy, and within two Months after it should be required, with twelve Gallies, four Ships, and Four Galleons,

A. D.

1526.

A. D.
1526.

A. D. fitted out wholly at his own Expence, ^{1526.} except the Payment of the Soldiers on board; and that these Vessels should be restored within Three Months from the Day of Embarkation: That, instead of the Land Forces which the King offered for Italy, he should pay unto Cæsar Two Hundred Thousand Crowns, one Half within Six Months, and the other Half within the next Year afterwards: That at the Time when the Hostages were to be set at Liberty he should give Bank Bills to Cæsar for the Payment of Six Thousand Foot for Six Months, as soon as he should arrive in Italy, supplying him also, at his own Cost, with Five Hundred Men at Arms, and a Train of Artillery: That he should indemnify Cæsar for his Promise made to the King of England to pay him the Pensions due from the King of France, the Arrears of which amounted to Five Hundred Thousand Crowns, or else pay Cæsar in ready Money: That both should supplicate the Pontiff to give publick Notice, as soon as possible, of a general Council for treating of Peace among among Christians, and forming Enter-^{A. D.} prises against the Infidels and Heretics, ^{1526.} and to grant a general Croisade for Three Years: That the King should within Six Months restore the Duke of Bourbon in ample Form to the Possession of all his States, and of his Goods movable and immovable, with all the Profits received, and should not be at Liberty to molest him for what was past, nor constrain him to inhabit or come into the Kingdom of France, but should leave him at full Liberty to proceed in a Course of Law concerning the County of Provence; and should also restore all those who had followed the Duke, and namely the Bishop of Autun, and M. de St. Valier: That the Prisoners on both Sides taken in War should be set at Liberty: That the Princess Margaret of Austria should be restored to the Possession of all that she enjoyed before the War: That the Prince of Orange should be set at Liberty, and be restored to the Principality of Orange, and to whatever he possessed at his Father's Death, which

A. D. 1526. had been taken from him on account of his following the Party of Cæsar; and the same Benefit was allowed to some other Noblemen: That the Marquis of Saluzzo should be restored to his State: That the King, as soon as he arrived in the first Town of his Kingdom, should ratify this Capitulation, and cause it to be ratified by the Dauphin as soon as he came to the Age of Fourteen Years. They nominated many by common Consent, among others the Swiss, but not one of the Italian Potentates except the Pontiff, who was named to be a Conservator of this Agreement, more out of Form and Ceremony than for any substantial Reason. To all this they added, that the King gave his Word of Honour, that if at any Time he should, for any Cause whatever, refuse to fulfil his Engagements, he would, of his own Accord, voluntarily return to Prison.

THIS Agreement was Matter of vast Surprise to all Christendom; for, as soon as it was understood that the first Thing
to

to be put into Execution was the De- ^{A. D.} liverance of the Most Christian King, ^{1526.} it was the universal Opinion that, after he was set at Liberty, he would on no account give up Burgundy, because it was a Member of too great Importance to the Kingdom of France: And, except those few who had advised Cæ- ſar to this Step, his whole Court had the ſame Sentiments; and, above all the reſt, the Great Chancellor blamed and deteſted the Convention, and with ſuch Vehemence that, tho' he had been commanded to ſubſcribe the Capitulation, yet he reſuſed to do it, alledging that the Authority with which he was inveſted ought not to be employed by him in dangerous and pernicious Affairs, as this before him certainly was. Nor could he be removed from his Reſolution by all the Indignation of Cæſar, who at length, finding him to perſiſt in his Obſtinacy, ſubſcribed the Inſtrument with his own Hand, and a few Days after went to Madrid, to ſettle the Affinity, and by familiar and friendly Converſa-tion to lay a Foundation for a laſting Friendſhip

A. D. Friendship and Benevolence between him-1526. self and the King. Wonderful were the Ceremonies and outward Professions that passed between them, they were often seen together in Public, had several long Conferences in private, went in one Coach in the Middle of the Day to a neighbouring Castle where resided Queen Eleonora, with whom the King made a Contract of Matrimony. But among so many Tokens of Peace and Friendship the Guards were not slackened, the Liberty not enlarged, but at the same time that he was carested like a Brother he was guarded like a Prisoner : Whence it might easily be judged that this was a Concord full of Discord*, an Affinity without Affection, and that the old Emulations and Jealousies between them would, on every Occasion, prevail over all Regard to Tyes and Alliances contracted by Force more than from any other Cause.

King of France
 espouses Eleonora.

AFTER

* He seems here to allude to a Verse of Lucan, speaking of an Agreement between the Triumvirate, Temporis angusti mansit Concordia discors.

A. D.

1526.

AFTER several Days spent in this Manner arrived the Ratification of the Regentess, with a Declaration that she chose to have the Dauphin of France accompanied by the Second Son rather than by the Twelve Lords. The King then set out from Madrid for the Frontiers, where he was to make an Exchange of his Person for his Two little Sons. He was accompanied by the Viceroy, the Author of his Liberty, on whom Cæsar had bestowed the City of Asti, and other States in Flanders, and in the Kingdom of Naples.

AT this Juncture Cæsar wrote a ceremonial Letter to the Pontiff, signifying that, out of a Desire of Peace, and of the common Good of Christendom, burying in Oblivion a Multitude of Offences and Enmities, he had restored Liberty to the King of France, and given him his own Sister in Marriage, and that he had chosen for Conservator of the Peace his Holiness, of whom he always desired to be a most obedient Son.

A. D.
1526.

Son. And a few Days after he writ him another Letter with his own Hand and sent it by Errera, the same who had brought him a Letter from the Pontiff written with his own Hand, in which he answers his, partly in a mild Strain, partly intermixed with somewhat harsh Expressions; concluding that he would restore the Dutchy of Milan to Francesco Sforza, if he should not be found guilty of the Crime laid to his Charge, and that he intended to have the Cause tried in a Court of Justice by Judges appointed by himself as his Superior: But if it should appear that he had transgressed, he could not dispence with himself from giving the Investiture of that State to the Duke of Bourbon, to whom his Holiness himself had been the Cause that he had promised it, having proposed it to him when Francesco Sforza lay sick: That to satisfy him, and to make the Italians easy, he had resolved not to keep it for himself, nor to give it to his own Brother; protesting, upon his Honour, that this was really his Intention, which he earnestly beseeched ſeeched him to approve, offering him A. D.

THE WARS IN ITALY.

413

1526. at all times his Authority and Forces, as an obedient Son of the Apoſtolic See. Errera carried alſo an Answer to the Minutes of the Articles that had been drawn up by the Pope in Favour of Francesco Sforza, which Cæſar, perſiſting in his firſt Reſolution had not been willing to approve.

HE ſent alſo by him to the Duke of Seſſa the Form of an Agreement, which was his ultimate Reſolution, with Authority to conclude it, in caſe the Pope would accept it. The Contents Articles propoſed by Cæſar
to the Pope. of it were in Subſtance, That Francesco Sforza ſhould be comprehended in their Confederacy, if he ſhould be found not guilty of Treason againſt Cæſar; but, in caſe of his Death or Deprivation, the Duke of Bourbon ſhould ſucceed in the Confederacy, and be inveſted by the Emperor with the Dutchy of Milan. The Obligation contracted by the Viceroy, for the Reſtitution of the Towns poſ-ſeſſed by the Duke of Ferrara, was confirmed, but on Condition that the Pope ſhould

A. D. 1526. should be bound to grant him the Investiture of Ferrara, and release him from the Penalty of the Contravention; a Thing contrary to the Pope's Intention, for he designed to exact of him the Penalty of one Hundred Thousand Ducats, to pay the One Hundred Thousand promised to Cæsar in case of that Restitution. He did not consent that the State of Milan should be obliged to take Salt from the Church, nor that in Matters concerning the Collation of Benefices in the Kingdom of Naples, Reference should be made to the Tenor of the Investitures, but to the Cession of preceding Kings, who in many Cases had despised the Rights and Authority of the Apostolic Sec. And because it had been agreed with the Legate that, in order to remove from Lombardy the Army, that was become burdensome to all Italy, there should be disbursed by the Pope, by himself, as King of Naples, and by the other Powers, One Hundred and Fifty Thousand Ducats, in which Case it would be conducted to Naples, or to some Country out of Italy, where where it pleased Cæsar, who, it was ^{A. D.} said, had a Design to make it pass over ^{1526.} to Barbary, it was proposed that, the Arrears of the Army being increased since that Time, the said Sum should be augmented to Two Hundred Thousand Ducats. The Duke of Sessa, and Errera, presented a Copy of these Articles to the Pontiff, with a Protestation that it was not in their Power to alter so much as one Syllable of it: All the Difficulties however would have been easily removed, had the Dutchy of Milan been disposed of in such a manner as to give no Cause of Jealousy to the Pontiff, and to the other Powers. But it was considered that the Duke of Bourbon was so implacable an Enemy to the King of France, that, either for his own Security, or from a Desire of invading France, he had always been very submissive to Cæsar, nor could it be expected that he would ever be uneasy at his exorbitant Greatness; and that the Article of removing the Army from Lombardy, which was so much desired by all, and for which Purpose they would

A. D. would not have grudged any Sum of 1526. Money, was of no Signification, since at Milan remained a Duke who would not only at every Beck from Cæsar admit his Troops, but perhaps desire and solicit their Presence for his own Interest.

Pope rejects
 them.

WHEREFORE the Pontiff, who, because, in the Agreement made by Cæsar with the King of France, there had been no material Mention made of him, and none at all of the Security of the States of Italy, had confirmed himself in the Persuasion he had before entertained that the Greatness of Cæsar must prove his Slavery, resolved not to accept the Agreement in the Manner in which it was proposed to him, but to preserve himself free till he should be certified of the Measures taken by the King of France with respect to the Observance of his Appointment. And he was the more encouraged because, besides the Probabilities of the Case, he had been informed of some Words spoken by the King before he was set at Liberty, and
 by

by others who were privy to his Coun- ^{A. D.} fels, by which it appeared he had no ^{1526.} Mind to fulfil his Engagements with Cæsar. To confirm the King in this Resolution, as a Point on which his own Security depended, he dispatched away post to France Pagolo Vettori, a Florentine, Commander of his Gallies, that he might be at Court at the same Time as the King should arrive, making this Speed not only to know as soon as possible his Mind, but also that the King, by receiving Hopes of an immediate Alliance with the Pontiff and Venetians against Cæsar, might the more readily determine himself. Pagolo therefore was commissioned, in the Name of the Pope, to congratulate his Majesty on his Deliverance, and to inform him of the Means used by the Pope for bringing about this happy Event, and how greatly the Treaty that he had held for confederating with his Mother had inclined Cæsar to set him at Liberty: That after this he should represent to the King that the Pope was very desirous of an universal Peace among Chri-VOL. VIII. D d stians,

A. D.
1526. } Christians, and that Cæsar and his Most Christian Majesty should jointly undertake an Expedition against the Turks, who were intent on making mighty Preparations for invading the Kingdom of Hungary this very Year. These were the apparent Subjects of his Commission, but the substantial and secret Point was, first to attempt, with all his Dexterity, to know the Inclination of the Most Christian King, and, if he should find him disposed to observe the Agreement; to proceed no farther, lest he should, to no Purpose, bring him more out of Favour with Cæsar than ever : But if he should perceive him otherwise inclined, or ambiguous, he should endeavour to confirm him, and take all Opportunities for encouraging him to take that Course, by Assurances of the Pontiff's Desire to unite with him for the common Good. He also dispatched into England the Protonotary Gambara, to use his Endeavours with that King to the same End : And, at his Sollicitations, the Venetians sent into France, with the like Commission, Andrea Rosso their Secretary.

Secretary. And because Pagolo, as soon ^{A. D. 1526.} as he arrived at Florence, fell sick and died, the Pontiff, tho' he took it for an ill Omen that the Ministers, whom he had now twice sent to France on this Negotiation, had perished on the Road, dispatched away in his Place Capino da Montoua. In the mean time his Holiness and the Venetians were not wanting to employ all possible Means for encouraging and keeping alive the Hopes of the Duke of Milan, lest his Fears and the Peace of Madrid, should drive him to precipitate himself into some Accommodation with Cæsar.

By this time the King of France ^{Ceremo-} was arrived at Fonterabia, a Town of ^{nies ob-} Cæsar's, situate on the Ocean, upon the ^{served on} Borders between Biscay and the Dutchy ^{setting the} of Guyenne; and, on the other Side, the ^{King of} Mother with the two Children were come ^{France at} to Bayonne, a few Leagues distant from Fonterabia, where she staid several Days before the Day appointed for making the Exchange, because she had been seized with the Gout on the Road. On the

A. D. Eighteenth of March, then, the King, ^{1526.} attended by the Viceroy, General Alarcone, and about fifty Horse, was conducted to the Bank of the River that divides the Kingdom of France from that of Spain, and at the same time Lautrech presented himself on the Bank with the Regentess, and an equal Number of Horse, and in the Middle of the River was a large Barge at Anchor with no Person in it. The King approached the Barge in a Skiff, in which, besides himself, was the Viceroy, Alarcone, and Eight others, all armed with short Weapons: On the other Side of the Barge came up Lautrech in another Skiff, or small Boat, with the Hostages, and Eight Men armed in the same Manner; then the Viceroy mounted the Barge with all his Men, and the King with them, and immediately after mounted Lautrech with his Eight Attendants; so that in the Barge was an equal Number on both Sides, the Viceroy having with him Alarcone, and Eight others, and the King attended by Lautrech and his Eight Men. As soon as they were all on board the Barge, Lautrech took the Dauphin out of
of

of the Skiff into the Barge, and put A. D. him into the Hands of the Viceroy, ^{1526.} who delivered him to Alarcone, by whom he was immediately put into their Boat; and at the same Instant the little Duke of Orleans was taken into the Barge, and was no sooner in, than the most Christian King leaped out of the Barge into his own Boat with such Quickness that this Exchange came to be made in the same Moment. As soon as the King got out of the Boat, on the Bank, he mounted a Turkish Horse of wonderful Swiftneſs, provided for that Purpoſe, and without ſtopping poſted to St. Jean de Luz, a Town of his own, four Leagues diſtant, from which, after taking ſome ſhort Refreshment, he ſpurred on with the ſame Speed to Bayonne, where he was received with inexpressible Joy by the whole Court. From hence he immediately diſpatched, with all Diligence, a Meſſenger to the King of England, with a Letter written with his own Hand, ſignifying to him his Deliverance, and acknowledging, in the moſt kind and affectionate Manner

A. D. 1526. Manner, that he was entirely indebted for his Liberty to his Good Offices, notifying his hearty Desire to enter into a strict Union and Intimacy with him, and his Resolution to proceed in all Occurrences by his Advice: And not long after he dispatched other Ambassadors to ratify, in a solemn Manner, the Peace which his Mother had made with him, laying a vast Stress on the Friendship of that King.

The End of the Sixteenth Book, and Eighth Volume.

THE Sixteenth Book properly terminates the History of Guicciardini, for here he finished the Revival of his Works, and therefore his Nephews, who, after his Death, obliged the World with this excellent Performance, gave us no more than Sixteen Books, which passed several Editions. But finding afterwards, by the Quickness of the Sale, that neither their own Profit, nor the Reputation of their Uncle were like to suffer by the Addition of the other Four which had not received his last Hand, they ventured to publish the whole Twenty Books, without regarding the Inequality and Incorrectness of the Four Last, which were the Reasons why the Translator, till the Publication of the Second Volume, intended only to give the first Sixteen, and comprehend them in Seven Volumes, as may be seen in his first Proposals. But these Reasons have been since outweighed by the Consideration of the usual Candour shewn by the Public to the imperfect tho' genuin Remains of a great Genius, and by the Encouragement given him by the unexpected Number of those who have favoured him with their Subscriptions; and therefore he is translating these Four Books, which will be delivered to the Subscribers without any additional Expence.

NAMES OF SUBSCRIBERS

SINCE THE PUBLICATION Of the SIXTH VOLUME.

A

L O R D	Archer.
Sir Willoughby	Austin, Bart.
Sir Anth.	Abdy, Bart. William	Atwood, M. D.
Mr. Thomas	Aris, Bookseller.

B

Hon. J. Smith	Barry.
Sir Richard	Bampfyeild, Bart. Philip	Bacon, Esq;
John	Butler, Esq;
James	Browne, Esq;
Francis	Beckford, Esq;
Thomas	Bladen, Esq;
Hugh	Barlow, Esq;

a

C

NAMES of SUBSCRIBERS.

C

Earl of	Carlisle.
Thomas	Cavenagh, Esq;
Francis	Chester, Esq;
Ashton	Curzon, Esq;

D

Hon. John	Dawney.
Sir William	Daniel, Bart.

F

Stephen	Fuller, Esq;
Sig. Andrea	Fantasia.
William	Fenwick, Esq;

G

Hon. John	Grey, Esq;
Sir John	Glynne, Bart. Bernard	Granville, Esq;
John	Gray, Esq;
Gilbert	Geddes, Esq;
Robert	Goodiere, Esq;

H

Sir Henry	Hunlock, Bart. Eliab

NAMES of SUBSCRIBERS.

Eliab	Harvey, Esq ;
Edward	Hanford, Esq ;
Joseph	Hickey, Esq ;
Richard	Hopkins, Esq ;
James	Harrington, Esq ;
Jerard	Hodges, Esq ;

I

Joshne	Ironmonger, Esq ;
--------	--------------------------

K

Mr. Thomas	Knobbs.
Mrs.	Keyt.

L

James	Lloyd, Esq ;
-------	---------------------

M

Duke of	Manchester.
Lady	Molesworth.
Lord William	Manners.
Sir Charles	Mordaunt, Bart.
Hon. William	Murray, Att. Gen.

NAMES of SUBSCRIBERS.

Daniel	Macnamara, Esq ;
Thomas	Mathews, Esq ;

N

Dutchess of	Norfolk.
Sir Roger	Newdigate, Bart.

O

Trinity	College	} Library,	} In Oxford.
St. John's	College
Morton	College
Queen's	College
Magdalen	College
Brafen-nose	College
All Souls	College
Exeter	College
Lincoln	College
Dr. King, L. L. D.	} St. Mary Hall,	} Dr.
President of
Doctor Tothergill,	} St. Edmund Hall, President of
Hon. and Rev. Mr.	} AllSoulsUn.Proc.
Tracey of
Dr. Joseph Smith,	} Queen's College, L. L. D. of
Rev. Mr. Henry	} Trinity College, Parker, of

NAMES OF SUBSCRIBERS.

Dr. Dereham, Pre-	} Oxford.	} St. John's.
sident of
Dr. Winchester of		Magdalen,
Rev. Roger Mather of		Brasen-nose, Un. Or.
Doctor Blackstone,		} All Souls, L. L. D. of
Rev. Mr. Buckler,		of All Souls, Dr. John Stanford,	} Baliol, S. T. B. of
Lewis Buck, Esq; of		Exeter.

P

Duke of	Portland.
Sir John	Packington, Bart.
Sir Thomas	Palmer, Bart.
Mr. Thomas	Payne, Bookseller.

S

Earl of	Stamford, John	Symmonds, Esq;
John	Symons, Esq;
John	Sutton, Esq;
Richard	Salvin, Esq;
Joseph	Salvadore, Esq;
Mr. Robert	Swann.
Mr. John	Shuckburgh, Books.

T

NAMES of SUBSCRIBERS.

T

Marchioness of	Tweedale.
Earl of	Tilney.
Stephen	Tempest, Esq;

V

Sir George	Vandeput, Bart.
Henry	Vernon, Esq;

W

Randle	Wilbraham, Esq;
Horatio	Walpole, jun. Esq;
John Hardley	Wilmot, Esq;
James	Welsh, Esq;
John Rolle	Walters, Esq;
John	White, Esq;
Mr. Richard	Ware.

Y

Hon. Charles	Yorke.
---------------------	--------

